"On the one hand, a veteran must be totally and permanently disabled to be entitled to pension, and the additional amount for additional dependents is less, and limited, than with respect to a surviving spouse. On the other hand, the amount payable to a surviving spouse is less, and such survivor is not entitled to a housebound rate.

"In addition, nonaged surviving spouses qualify for pension without having to meet the disability criteria."

The VA asserted that such "inconsistencies, inequities, and anomalies * * * cannot all be corrected within the framework of the law now constituted" and reiterated the principles which it had advanced for a new pension program in its report * * *

* * * * *

In the light of criticisms and suggestions made in testimony at the hearing and the recommendations of the VA (further amplified in followup discussions between Committee and VA staff), the Committee ordered the bill reported on March 23, 1978, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and a title amendment. The objectives of the bill as reported . . . are identical to those of the bill as introduced.

The bill as reported also provides for a new program of improved dependency and indemnity compensation benefits for the surviving parents of veterans who died as a result of their service-connected disabilities. In addition, it provides for a cost-of-living increase in the pension payable to certain institutionalized veterans. Finally, it names two VA hospitals located in Tampa, Florida and Bedford, Massachusetts.

OTHER PENSION PROPOSALS

In recent years, there has been much interest in two very costly types of legislation related to the pension program—"social security pass-through" legislation under which the amounts of any social security cost-of-living increases received by a pensioner would be disregarded in computing his or her pension entitlement, and World War I "service pension" legislation under which all World War I veterans and survivors would receive a non-need-based monthly payment.

A pass-through of social security cost-of-living increases is intended to solve the continuing problems experienced by many pensioners, who not only do not benefit from the cost-of-living rate increases in the pension program enacted by Congress, but who also suffer reductions in pension benefits directly attributable to social security cost-of-living increases. Such measures would not, however, address the basic problem inherent in the current program which causes reductions in pension following a social security cost-of-living increase. Rather, such measures would create new inequities; and, within a few years, a class of pensioners would be created having actual income substantially above the national minimum standard of need. For example, on November 3, 1977, the Senate overwhelmingly adopted Amendment No. 1580 to H.R. 9346, the Social Security Amendments of 1977. This amendment, not agreed to in conference, would have directed the VA to exclude from the countable income of a pensioner any social security cost-of-living increase occurring after 1979. Since only persons who have social security income would benefit from this exclusion, and because of the value of the exclusion would be compounded each year, the effect of such a measure would have been to create several classes of pensioners whose aggregate incomes would differ sharply even though their needs were identical. Such an approach would strike at the heart of the pension program as a need-based income maintenance system, by using available resources to benefit those receiving social security income while those who are most in need would not benefit at all.

The first-year (fiscal year 1978) cost of S. 107, a pass-through measure retroactive to 1972, was estimated at $2.2 billion. A bill which would operate prospectively only, S. 1195, would have a first-year (fiscal year 1978) cost of $118.9 million, but its future costs would be almost as high as those for S. 107, which was estimated to cost $1.14 billion in 1982.

The effect of an unrestricted, non-need-based service pension for World War I veterans and survivors would be to distribute a large proportion of the limited dollars available for the pension program to those who are not in need. The estimated costs of a service pension—even if limited to World War I veterans and survivors—would increase budget allocations for pension benefits far beyond what is a reasonable or equitable level for this type of program, when all competing veterans' benefits programs are taken into account—especially those for service-connected veterans. For example, the VA estimated that one World War I service pension measure, if enacted, would add approximately $1.7 billion to the cost of the existing program in fiscal year 1979.

In view of the support evidenced for pass-through and service-pension legislation and the very large costs which they would generate if enacted, the Committee believes that the need is even greater to achieve a restructuring of the pension program that will provide substantial increases in benefits for those in greatest need and eliminate the other inequitable features of the current program which have created many of the quite understandable concerns underlying those approaches.

LONG-RANGE COST ESTIMATE

The Committee has carefully followed the development by the Office of Management and Budget's Special Studies Division of a long-range computer model [1] simulating the anticipated characteristics of the pension population over the next 25 years. At the Committee's request, this model was used to prepare comparisons between the expected total costs of the current program at 5 year intervals between 1980 and 2000 and the expected total costs of S. 2384 over the same period.

The following table, based on one prepared by OMB using its own economic assumptions, estimates the total costs in current dollars of the years indicated. "Current dollars of the years indicated" are calculated to reflect the estimated increase in the Consumer Price Index which is assumed to continue through out the period 1980–2000.

TABLE 3.—OMB ESTIMATES OF TOTAL COSTS IN CURRENT DOLLARS OF THE YEARS INDICATED

| | 1980 | 1985 | 1990 | 1995 | 2000 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Current program (maximum) [1] | $3,112 | $4,248 | $5,517 | $7,432 | $9,709 |
| Current program (intermediate) [2] | 2,971 | 3,691 | 4,395 | 5,492 | 5,687 |
| S. 2384 | 3,213 | 3,780 | 4,479 | 5,731 | 7,525 |

[1] This estimate assumes that the current program would be adjusted in the future so that all pension payments would be increased in accordance with the rise in the Consumer Price Index.

[2] This estimate assumes that the current congressional practice of adjusting the maximum benefit and the annual income limitations to accord with the rise in the CPI would continue without changing the formula used to calculate actual benefit payments.

[1] A description of the long-range computer model is found in chapter IX of the VA pension report (that chapter is reproduced in its entirely in Appendix B of this report).

It should be noted that OMB's estimate of "total costs" do not include the cost of the pension program for surviving children because there are insufficient data upon which to estimate these costs. However, it is reasonable to assume that the costs shown for "current program" would be many hundreds of millions higher if surviving children were included, but the costs shown for S. 2384 would be only slightly increased. Thus, the net cost of S. 2384 would be significantly lower than shown.

The OMB estimate also does not compare the long-range costs of S. 2384 with the costs of a pass-through or service-pension measure added to the costs of the current program if not restructured. The long-range costs of such legislation would, of course, be far higher even than those shown for "current program (maximum)".

An examination of this table indicates that the difference between the expected long-range maximum total costs of the current program and S. 2384 would be sizable. The two sets of figures shown for "current program" are very different. The "maximum" costs assume that the present pension program would continue more or less in its present form except that all the benefit amounts payable under that program would be "indexed"—increased annually in accordance with the CPI—instead of continuing the current practice of increasing only the maximum benefits payable and the annual income limitations, and providing "adjustments" for the intermediate rates through the application of the formula.

The table indicates that by 1985 the enactment of S. 2384 would result in cost savings of $468 million over the cost of the current program if indexed and that these savings would continue to rise thereafter—to about $1.7 billion by 1995.

IMPROVED PENSION BENEFIT RATES SET ABOVE NATIONAL MINIMUM STANDARD OF NEED

As the foregoing discussion clearly illustrates, this Nation has always acknowledged the special obligation it owes to those veterans who served our country during wartime. A pension program to assist those veterans and their survivors when they are in need is one of the ways our Nation has traditionally discharged this obligation. In the Committee's view, an effective pension program should provide assurance that no veteran who served on active duty in wartime who is unable to support himself or herself by reason of permanent and total non-service-connected disability or age will be relegated to poverty levels of subsistence or to welfare programs to meet basic subsistence needs. To achieve that goal, the Committee concluded that pension rates should be determined by reference to a national minimum standard of need so that beneficiaries will have sufficient assured income to permit them to live in dignity.

* * * * *

However, as a guide to determining the basic maximum annual pension rates ("income standards")—those applicable to a veteran who has no dependent family members and a veteran with one dependent family member—the Committee has adopted the poverty level guidelines published annually (in April) by the Department of Labor in the form of levels of income related to family size. These levels of income are used to establish basic eligibility for certain programs for economically disadvantaged persons, such as employment and training under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA). The figures released in April 1978, for use during the following 12 months are shown by the following table (which also shows those published in April 1977, for purposes of comparison):

| Family size | April 1978 Continental United States Nonfarm | Continental United States Farm | Hawaii Nonfarm | Hawaii Farm | Alaska Nonfarm | Alaska Farm | April 1977 Continental United States Nonfarm | April 1977 Continental United States Farm |
| 1 | $3,140 | $2,650 | $3,620 | $3,130 | $3,940 | $3,380 | $2,970 | $2,550 |
| 2 | 4,160 | 3,550 | 4,790 | 4,110 | 5,210 | 4,450 | 3,930 | 3,360 |
| 3 | 5,180 | 4,410 | 5,960 | 5,050 | 6,480 | 5,520 | 4,890 | 4,170 |
| 4 | 6,200 | 5,270 | 7,130 | 6,070 | 7,750 | 6,550 | 5,850 | 4,980 |
| 5 | 7,220 | 6,130 | 8,300 | 7,050 | 9,020 | 7,660 | 6,810 | 5,790 |
| 6 | 8,240 | 6,990 | 9,470 | 8,030 | 10,290 | 8,730 | 7,770 | 6,600 |

Source: U.S. Department of Labor.

As the table shows, the continental United States nonfarm level for an individual living alone is $3,140 and for a family of two $4,160.

Those guidelines are based on the basic definition of poverty underlying the census data and are similarly adjusted annually by the increase in the Consumer Price Index. Prepared by and transmitted to the Department of Labor by the Department of Commerce, they are designed to guide Federal agencies in determining eligibility for particular programs and thus provide an appropriate measure of determining whether a person is economically disadvantaged.

New Income Standard Approach

* * * * *

In designing the new program, the Committee was guided by the previous reform measure, S. 2635, the proposed "Veterans and Survivors Pension Reform Act," passed by the Senate in 1975 but not acted on by the House. That bill attempted to meet the objectives of an equitable need-based pension program by establishing a "one-variable system".

The current pension program is a "two-variable" system with an annual income limitation and a sliding scale of rates. Under a one-variable system, basic levels of income support—"income standards"—are established by law, based on family size and other factors, and, in each case, the amount of pension payable is determined by subtracting the annual countable income available to the veteran or survivor from the applicable income standard.

The Committee bill adopts the one-variable approach with income standards established for different categories of beneficiaries. The amounts of the income standards for single veterans and those with a spouse or one dependent child are set at levels designed to guarantee that such pensioners will have income at or above the income standard applicable to their particular situations. In the case of larger families, the income standards are increased to provide income support for the additional family members. In addition, increases are also provided for veterans who are housebound and for those in need of regular aid and attendance.

Under the current pension program, a maximum monthly payment rate is set for veterans and surviving spouses who have little or no other income, and, for those who do have other income, that rate is reduced according to the applicable rate-decrement-income-limitation formula to determine the amount of pension payable, based on their annual countable income, which may not exceed the applicable income limitations.

The maximum annual payment under the current pension program, as increased by the 6.5-percent increase enacted in Public Law 95-204, effective January 1, 1978, is $2,364 ($197 per month) for a veteran who has no dependents and no other income—$1,596 for a surviving spouse. A veteran with one dependent and no other income cannot receive more than $2,544 annually, with $60 added annually for each of up to two additional dependents. The latter amount—$5 per month for each of up to two additional dependents—is obviously inadequate. Thus, a veteran who has a spouse and does not have any other income receives a pension that is far below the national minimum standard of need, which was $4,160 for a two-person household in the most recent data published by the Department of Labor; and married veterans with more than 2 children do not receive increased payments for the additional children.

Existing law provides even less adequately for a surviving spouse. The surviving spouse without dependents who has no other income receives a maximum pension payment from the VA of $133 per month, or $1,596 per year—approximately two-thirds of the veteran's rate.

Thus, many disabled or elderly wartime veterans and the survivors of wartime veterans are forced to turn to income-assistance and in-kind programs such as Supplemental Security Income and food stamps merely to survive.

The benefits payable to pensioners who do have other income are determined by the rate-decrement-income-limitation formulas that are so complicated that literally only a very few people understand how they work. When Congress enacts a cost-of-living increase applicable to the current pension program, the complexities of these formulas are such that the actual percentage increase in the intermediate rates may be more or less than the percentage increase in the maximum rates and the annual income limitations. Moreover, use of this formula approach has meant that, especially in recent years, the aggregate incomes of pensioners who have social security income have not increased commensurately with increases in the Consumer Price Index, thus frustrating the apparent intent of the Congress in providing cost-of-living increases for them, especially in those situations in which the pensioner's total income is composed of VA pension plus social security, both of which Congress intends to be increased according to the rise in the Consumer Price Index. In fact, in many instances, the effect of a pension rate increase is merely to diminish the amount of reduction in pension benefits a veteran or surviving spouse was otherwise scheduled to receive.

On the other hand, features such as the exclusion from income of 10 percent of all retirement income, the exclusion of all of a veteran's spouse's earned income, and the minimum pension provision have tended, singly or in combination, to permit the payment of substantial amounts of pension dollars to persons whose nonpension income is well above the national minimum standard of need.

The one-variable income-standard approach adopted for the improved pension program in the Committee bill replaces this complicated and inequitable system with a simplified method of determining the amount of improved pension payable and ensures that no wartime veteran or surviving spouse who is permanently and totally disabled from non-service-connected causes, or who is 65 or over, will be forced to live at poverty subsistence levels. The basic income standards—maximum rates—are set slightly above the poverty guidelines developed and published by the Department of Labor, and will assure that all eligible veterans and survivors receive a pension commensurate with their need. Under the income-standard approach, persons who have no other income would be entitled to receive the maximum amounts. For persons who do have other income, the improved pension income standard would be reduced dollar for dollar—except for certain exclusions—so that those persons would receive improved pension as a supplement to their other income. In this way, the aggregate income of a veteran who has no other income would generally be identical to that of a similarly-circumstanced veteran who does have some other income.

The income standard for a veteran or surviving spouse who has one dependent would be substantially increased in the Committee bill to be 1.32 times the basic standard for a veteran or surviving spouse with no dependents. That ratio, 1.32:1, is derived from the "poverty level guidelines" developed and published by the Department of Labor. This ratio in current pension law is 1.07:1 for veterans and 1.20:1 for surviving spouses. These ratios are far too low to account for the increased cost of supporting a two-person household.

Moreover, the income standard for each category would be increased by $660 for each additional dependent child. This amount is far more clearly related to the actual cost of supporting a dependent child than are the present levels.

IMPROVED PENSION BENEFITS FOR VETERANS

In the Committee bill, as has been noted, the maximum rates of improved pension payable to veterans who are permanently and totally disabled from non-service-connected causes, or who are 65 or older, are substantially increased over the maximum rates authorized under the current program. Under the current program, the maximum monthly rate payable to a veteran who has no dependent family members and who is not in need of regular aid and attendance nor permanently housebound is $197 per month ($2,364 per year), if the veteran has countable income not exceeding $300 per year. Under the Committee bill, the maximum annual rate authorized for such veteran who has no other income is $3,240 ($270 per month), an amount which is based on the Department of Labor's April 1978, income level ($3,140) for a one-person household, adjusted by the estimated rise in the Consumer Price Index between April 1978, and October 1978, and slightly increased so as to be divisible by twelve.

The following table shows the maximum annual rates of improved pension proposed in the Committee bill for veterans:

TABLE 7.—Improved pension rates for veterans

| | Rates |
|---|---|
| Veteran without dependent spouse or child | $3,240 |
| Veteran with one dependent (spouse or child) | 4,284 |
| Veteran in need of regular aid and attendance without dependents | 5,340 |
| Veteran in need of regular aid and attendance with one dependent | 6,384 |
| Veteran permanently housebound without dependents | 4,016 |
| Veteran permanently housebound with one dependent | 5,060 |
| Two veterans married to one another | 4,284 |
| Increase for each additional dependent child | 660 |

* * * * *

Under the Committee bill, the annual income of any eligible veteran who has no dependent family members and whose annual countable income falls below the income standard of $3,240 would be entitled to improved pension benefits in the amount necessary to bring the veteran's aggregate countable income up to the income standard. * * *

* * * * *

The annual rate of improved pension applicable to such a veteran would be reduced by the veteran's annual countable income, dollar for dollar in the case of nonemployment income (such as retirement benefits), but subject to the current-work income exclusion of $780, plus one-half the remainder, and other applicable exclusions, more fully discussed below.

* * * However, there are certain anomalies and inequities in the current program relating to married veterans and those who have children which the Committee bill also would address. It has been previously noted that a veteran who has more than three dependent family members cannot, under current law, receive any increase in pension benefits for such additional family members regardless of how little income the family has. This inexplicable inequity in an income-maintenance program is addressed by the Committee bill, which provides for substantially higher annual income standards applicable to such situations.

A second anomaly in the current program relates to the treatment of family income. Under the current program, the income of a veteran's spouse, with whom the veteran is living or to whose support the veteran is reasonably contributing, is considered as the income of the veteran to the extent such income is reasonably available to or for the veteran. The income of the veteran's dependent children is not considered, regardless of the amount, and the spouse's income is counted only to the extent that it exceeds the greater of (1) $1,200, or (2) all of the spouse's earned income. If the spouse's income is retirement income, only 90 percent of such income is countable.

It must be remembered in connection with provisions relating to married veterans that, in almost all cases, veterans who are pension beneficiaries are male. These provisions were incorporated into the pension program in order to allow married veterans and their spouses to benefit from the increased income support available to a household in which the spouse of a disabled or elderly person is employed or has a separate income. Because pension benefit rates at the time these exclusions were added were relatively low, and the average wages paid to women were also, low, the aggregate household incomes of married veterans—pension plus the veteran's and spouse's other income—did not seem inequitable in view of the increased income necessary to support a two-person household. Since that time, women have entered the work force in increasing numbers and median incomes of women have risen substantially. According to the VA Pension Report, the average family income of married veterans is far above that of those who have no dependent family members—attributable in most cases to the spouse's income. The fact that a veteran may receive need-based pension benefits exceeding $2,500 per year even though his or her spouse earns $10,000 a year or more does a great injustice to the principle that pension dollars should be distributed to those who are truly needy.

The Committee bill, however, is also based on the principle that a need-based income maintenance program must have a higher standard of need, as measured by income, for cases in which the beneficiary is legally responsible for his or her spouse's support and the family's dependent children. Consequently, in the Committee bill, the income standard applicable to a veteran with one dependent family member (who may be either a spouse or a child) has been increased to be 1.32 times the basic income standard applicable to a veteran who has no dependent family members. The ratio in current law is 1.08:1—so that the veteran who has a dependent spouse and less than $500 in annual countable income receives $15 per month for the support of his or her dependent spouse. The ratio adopted in the Committee bill was derived from the ratio between the income levels of a one-person household and a two-person household in the poverty level guidelines previously discussed. As in the case of the income standard applicable to a veteran who has no dependent family members, the income standard applicable to a veteran who has one dependent family member was increased to account for the estimated rise in the Consumer Price Index between April 1978, and October 1978, and then slightly increased so as to be divisible by 12. Consequently, an eligible veteran with a dependent spouse will be assured of improved pension benefits to bring his or her annual aggregate income up to the income standard of $4,284.

The income standard would also be increased by $660 for each dependent child supported by the veteran, without any limitation on the number, thus addressing one of the harshest inequities in the current program.

The Committee bill also recognizes, as a second important principle applicable to a need-based income maintenance program, that, in the case of benefits payable to a household consisting of more than one person. all the income of the family members on whose behalf the primary beneficiary—in this case, the veteran—is to receive benefits should be generally considered, to the extent it is reasonably available to the primary beneficiary. Thus, the Committee bill requires generally that the income of the veteran, the veteran's spouse, and the veteran's dependent children, if any, be considered in determining the veteran's entitlement, if the veteran is to receive increased improved pension for such persons. * * *

IMPROVED PENSION BENEFITS FOR VETERANS WHO ARE IN NEED OF REGULAR AID AND ATTENDANCE

The Commission bill provides for higher improved pension rates—with the amount of the increase in the rate based on the present "aid and attendance" allowance—for veterans in need of regular aid and attendance in response to the very clear and pressing needs of those severely disabled veterans for funds to defray the costs of such care.

Under current law, veterans of World War I and later periods of war who are in need of regular aid and attendance receive $165 per month for this purpose in addition to their pension benefit payment. For example, a single veteran who has little or no other income and is thus entitled to the maximum pension rate of $197 per month would receive a total of $362 per month. A single veteran whose annual countable income is less than $3,770 but more than $3,200 and who is thus entitled to the minimum pension rate of $5 per month would receive a total of $170 per month. In the first case, the veteran would have annual pension of $4,344; in the second case, the veteran would have annual income (pension plus other income) of approximately $5,240, assuming annual countable income of $3,200. If the veteran's nonpension income were retirement income (only 90 percent of which is counted), such as social security benefits, the actual aggregate income would be approximately $5,592.

Under the Committee bill, the annual income standard applicable to veterans is increased by $2,100, when the veteran is in need of regular aid and attendance. Thus, in the case of a veteran who has no dependent family members, the annual income standard would be $5,340; in the case of a veteran who has one dependent family member the annual income standard would be $6,384, increased by $660 for each additional dependent child. The annual rate would generally be reduced dollar for dollar by other income available to the veteran. However, the current-work income exclusion applicable to the incomes of veterans in need of regular aid and attendance (and their spouses' and children's incomes) would be increased to $1,560 plus one-half of the remainder, permitting these veterans to remain eligible for improved pension at higher levels of aggregate family income.

The substantially higher benefit levels and the higher current-work income exclusion would provide greater income security to these very seriously disabled veterans to help defray the added costs for the personal care they need. Such costs are typically in the form of direct expenditures for a paid attendant or the indirect cost of employment foregone by a family member who provides the necessary assistance.

IMPROVED PENSION BENEFITS FOR VETERANS WHO ARE PERMANENTLY HOUSEBOUND

The Committee bill also provides for increased improved pension rates—with the amount of the increase in the rate based on the present "housebound" allowance—for those veterans who are not so disabled as to require regular aid and attendance but who are either substantially confined to the immediate premises of their homes (or the ward and clinical areas of a health-care facility if they are institutionalized) or who have additional disabilities independently ratable at 60 percent or more. Under current law, an allowance of $61 per month ($732 per year)—approximately 40 percent of the aid and attendance allowance—is payable to a veteran who is so disabled; this sum is added to the basic pension payment. A veteran eligible for this "add-on" benefit who receives a small increase in nonpension income such that his or her income exceeds the income limitations, loses eligibility for the "housebound" allowance, so that his or her income declines sharply. For example, a housebound veteran without dependent family members who has nonpension income of $3,760 receives $60 per year in pension benefits and a housebound allowance of $732, totaling $4,552 in aggregate income. If the veteran's nonpension income increased by only $25 per year, pension eligibility would be terminated, resulting in a decline in aggregate income of $767 ($4,552 minus $3,785).

Under the Committee bill, the basic annual improved pension rates for these veterans would be increased by $776—to $4,016 in the case of a veteran who has no dependent family members and to $5,060 in the case of a veteran with one dependent family member, with $660 to be added for each additional dependent child. In each case, the rate payable would be reduced by the amount of the veteran's countable annual income and the income of dependent family members which is reasonably available to the veteran. These provisions assure an income standard well above the poverty line for these seriously disabled veterans, and also assure that, in cases in which an increase in outside income results in a termination of improved pension benefits, the veteran does not suffer a sharp decline in aggregate income.

SPECIAL ADD-ON IN IMPROVED PENSION BENEFITS FOR VETERANS OF WORLD WAR I

The Committee bill provides for a 25-percent increase in improved pension benefits payable to a veteran of a period of war if veterans of that period of war were not entitled to home loan guaranty benefits under chapter 37 of title 38 or educational assistance benefits under chapter 34 of such title, or under prior corresponding provisions of law. The extra payment will be proportionately larger to those with little income other than improved pension and will not be subject to reduction by other income. All veterans who would be entitled to the 25-percent add-on are veterans of World War I or earlier periods of war, such as the Mexican border period, because these GI Bill educational and loan guaranty benefits, which were first adopted during World War II, were never extended to veterans of earlier wars.

Under current law, a 25-percent add-on in benefit rates is applicable to the pension payable to any veteran reaching the age of 78. Although this add-on was not intended to benefit World War I veterans exclusively, it was clearly recognized at the time of its adoption in the 94th Congress (Public Law 94-432) that almost all veterans who would be entitled to receive it at that time were veterans of World War I.

The Committee, in considering the design of the improved pension program, rejected the concept of an add-on related to age because there is no data to support the notion that persons 78 years of age and over who are not so disabled as to be housebound or in need of regular aid and attendance have a greater need for income support than persons 75, 70, or any other age less than age 78.

The 25-percent add-on in the Committee bill does not find its justification in the assertion that persons of a particular age require more income support. Nor does it reflect the view that service during any particular war period should be regarded as more or less meritorious than service during any other war period. Rather, the add-on responds to the legitimate claims of World War I veterans, who were never made eligible for the readjustment benefits generally available to veterans of later periods of war. To the extent that the lack of readjustment benefits for World War I veterans prevented some veterans of that war from attaining sufficient income security in their old age to prevent their having to turn to the income assistance provided by the pension program, this special benefit helps to make up for that lack of earlier assistance.

IMPROVED PENSION BENEFITS FOR SURVIVING SPOUSES

The provisions in the Committee bill relating to surviving spouses are substantially different from those in the current pension program. Under current law, the surviving spouses of veterans of World War I and later periods of war generally receive pension benefits, including aid and attendance allowances, at two-thirds of the rate applicable to veterans. However, there are no eligibility requirements of disability or age applicable to surviving spouses; and surviving spouses are not eligible for housebound allowances. If the surviving spouse has a dependent child, and no other income, the maximum monthly rate is increased by $26 to $159 ($1,908 per year)—again, two-thirds of the maximum payable to a veteran with one dependent. For each additional child, however, the surviving spouse may receive $26 per month ($312 per year) with no limitation—anomalously, as compared to the situation when the veteran was living—on the number for whom such additional allowances may be paid.

The pension payable to surviving spouses who have other income is determined by means of a complex formula similar to that applicable to veterans, with a minimum pension of $5 payable to those whose annual countable incomes would yield no pension under the formula but do not exceed the income limitations of $3,770, in the case of a surviving spouse without dependents, and $5,070 in the case of a surviving spouse with one or more dependent children. A surviving spouse who is so disabled as to require regular aid and attendance receives an additional $79 per month.

Although current law provides for determinations of the annual countable income and net worth of surviving spouses comparable to those required of veterans, it does not require that the income of dependent children for whom the surviving spouse receives increased pension be included with the surviving spouse's income in determining pension entitlement.

Certain basic requirements applicable to surviving spouses under current law are retained intact in the improved pension program, such as the eligibility requirements relating to marriage. Generally, a surviving spouse is eligible if the marriage occured before certain specified dates (which differ for each war period), the marriage lasted for 1 year or more, or a child was born of or before the marriage.

With respect to nondisabled, nonelderly surviving spouses without small children, the Committee bill provides for improved pension benefits at two-thirds of the rates applicable to veterans.

However, if the surviving spouse is permanently and totally disabled—using the same standard of disability that applies to a veteran—or is 65 or over, the annual income standard would be the same as that for a veteran, $3,240, and $4,284 if such a surviving spouse has one dependent child. In all cases, the annual income standard applicable to a surviving spouse who has more than one dependent child would be increased by $660 for each such child, the same increase for children as is applicable to veterans. In addition, the benefit rates for all surviving spouses in need of regular aid and attendance are equalized, as are the special exclusions from income applicable to veterans in need of aid and attendance. And if the surviving spouse has a child aged 6 or under, or a dependent helpless child of any age who became helpless before reaching the age of 18, the applicable annual income standard is the same as that for a veteran with one dependent, $4,284.

In all such cases, the surviving spouse may receive increased improved pension benefits for a child of the veteran in the surviving spouse's custody (or in the case of a dependent helpless child, one whom the surviving spouse supports) even though she (or he) is not the natural parent of the child.

The annual income standards for surviving spouses in various categories are thus as follows:

TABLE 10.—Improved pension rates for surviving spouses

| | Rates |
|---|---|
| Surviving spouse age 65 or over or permanently and totally disabled without dependent child | $3,240 |
| Surviving spouse age 65 or over or permanently and totally disabled with one dependent child | 4,284 |
| Surviving spouse with one dependent child age 6 or under or helpless | 4,284 |
| Surviving spouse permanently and totally disabled in need of regular aid and attendance without dependent child | 5,340 |
| Surviving spouse permanently and totally disabled in need of regular aid and attendance with one dependent child | 6,384 |
| Other surviving spouse without dependent child | 2,172 |
| Other surviving spouse with one dependent child | 2,868 |
| Increase for each additional dependent child | 660 |

As in the case of a veteran, the annual improved pension rate would be reduced dollar for dollar by annual income, with such income subject to the same exclusions as are applicable to veterans, including the current-work income exclusions.

IMPROVED PENSION BENEFITS FOR SURVIVING CHILDREN

The Committee bill provides for improved pension benefits for the surviving children of wartime veterans. Although the basic requirements of eligibility would not be changed from those in existing law, the improved pension program for these children differs substantially in other ways.

Under current law, a surviving child is eligible for pension (as distinguished from an increase for the child's support in the pension paid to a surviving spouse receiving pension) only where there is no surviving spouse, the surviving spouse does not have custody of the child, or the surviving spouse is ineligible for pension by reason of income or remarriage. Generally, a child remains eligible until he or she marries, reaches the age of 18, or, in the case of a child attending a VA-approved educational institution, until age 23. However, if the child becomes permanently incapable of self-support before reaching the age of 18, pension benefits may continue throughout the child's life.

If there is only one child, the pension benefit is $61 per month as long as the child's countable income (all earned income is excluded) does not exceed the annual income limitation of $3,080. If there is more than one child, the basic monthly rate is increased by $26 and the total amount is divided by the number of children with each child receiving an equal share. For example, if there are four children, each would receive $34.75 monthly. No other reduction in the amounts payable is made. The annual income of such a child is determined (after excluding all of the child's earned income) according to the rules generally applicable to determinations of annual income. A surviving child is not required to submit annual income reports to the VA, but pension benefits may be denied or discontinued if the child's net worth is excessive. No account is taken of the income or net worth of the person or persons with whom the child resides who are legally responsible for the child's support under State laws.

Although the VA does not gather data on the family situations of surviving children eligible for pension, it seems reasonable to assume that most such children reside with the surviving spouse who is ineligible for pension by reason of income or remarriage.

In the Pension Report, the VA made the following recommendation:

"A new pension program should count all family income for pension purposes, including earned income, as long as the family unit is intact. Pension payments should increase/decrease dollar for dollar as family income [decreases/increases] . . . ." (page 408).

Although, as more fully discussed below, the Committee has not adopted the VA's recommendation on the treatment of earned income, it agrees with the VA that generally all income available to a veteran or survivor should be considered in determining eligibility for improved pension. Thus, the income of a veteran and the income of a veteran's dependent family members are considered together, and the same principle is applied to the income of a surviving spouse and the dependent children for whom the surviving spouse receives increased improved pension. This principle, in the view of the Committee, should also be applied to the income of the surviving child and the income of any person (or persons) with whom a child is residing who is (are) legally responsible for the child's support under the laws of the State where the child resides.

In accordance with these principles, the Committee bill provides for an annual rate of improved pension of $660, reduced by the child's countable income, in situations where the child is not residing with a person or persons legally responsible for the child's support. If, for example, both the veteran and the veteran's spouse are killed in an accident and the surviving children then live in a foster home, or in the home of a relative having no personal legal responsibility for support, each child would be eligible for improved pension at the annual rate of $660, reduced by each child's annual income. In all cases, the child's current-work income would be counted only to the extent that it exceeds the amounts of income an unmarried person must have before being required to file a Federal income tax return (currently, $2,950). In addition, a child pursuing a postsecondary course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training would be entitled to an exclusion from his or her current-work income amounts equal to amounts paid in the previous calendar year for educational expenses. The excess over those amounts would be subject to the current-work exclusion of $780, plus one-half of the remainder. Those provisions, applicable also to a dependent child's current-work income, are more fully described below. Net worth determinations and annual reporting requirements similar to those required of veterans and surviving spouses receiving improved pension would apply.

However, when the surviving child resides with the surviving spouse who then remarries, the income of the child, together with the income of the surviving spouse, would be considered only if the new spouse assumes eligibility for improved pension. The income of the surviving spouse's new spouse would be considered only if the new spose assumes legal responsibility—generally through adoption—for the support of the veteran's child.

Under the Committee bill, the annual rate of improved pension for any one such child could not exceed the amount by which $660 exceeds the annual income of such child. The annual rate would be determined by subtracting from the applicable income standard the income of the child (subject to the current-work income exclusion) together with the income of the surviving spouse (and the income of the new spouse, if that person has assumed legal responsibility for the support of the child), determined in accordance with the general provisions of the Committee bill relating to income determinations. In all such cases, the applicable income standards would be determined under regulations to be prescribed by the Administrator and based on the provisions of the Committee bill applicable to surviving spouses. * * *

"MINIMUM" IMPROVED PENSION BENEFITS PAYABLE LESS FREQUENTLY THAN MONTHLY

The Committee bill provides, that when the annual improved pension amount payable to any beneficiary is less than 4 percent of the maximum annual rate payable to a veteran who has no dependent family members and no countable income, improved pension benefits may be paid less frequently than monthly. For the period between the effective date of the bill and the first annual automatic adjustment, which is expected to occur in June 1979 (for payments beginning July 1979), that amount would be any amount less than $129.60 per year (4 percent of $3,240). * * *

This provision differs substantially from existing law, which provides that in no case shall the pension payable to a veteran or surviving spouse, whose countable income does not exceed the applicable income limitations be less than $5 per month. The "minimum pension" provision was added in an effort to address the anomaly created by the rate-decrement-income-limitation formula. Under the formula, a person whose countable income is within the applicable income limitation but above a certain amount would not be entitled to any pension were it not for the "minimum pension" provision. For example, under existing law, a single veteran with countable income of $3,600 per year—whose pension entitlement would otherwise be zero—receives $5 per month. The fact that the incomes of veterans and surviving spouses are generally rising means that each year more and more pensioners receive the minimum pension and that the administrative costs associated with the payment of these minimal benefits are also rising.

The method to be employed under the Committee bill is designed to assure not only that the administrative costs associated with the payment of small amounts of improved pension would be less but also that the amount that would trigger payment less frequently than monthly would rise annually, in accordance with the percentage increase in the applicable annual income standards. * * *

In this way, the anomaly which the $5 monthly minimum pension benefit represents—of a fixed benefit losing its real value, over time, at the same time that the cost of its administration are rising—would be eliminated in the new program.

DETERMINATIONS OF ANNUAL INCOME

The Committee believes that the veterans' and survivors' non-service-connected disability and death pension program is intended to be, and should be, a need-based income-maintenance program. In such a need-based program, the question of how other income of the potential recipient is to be treated is extremely significant for the reason that most such recipients do have other income and the amount of such income indicates the extent of need. In all such cases, the Committee bill is premised on the theory that it is the aggregate income available to the household for its basic requirements which must be considered in order to make a fair and equitable determination of the need for income-maintenance benefits.

* * * * *

As previously explained, the Committee bill is designed to achieve several objectives. Among these is to provide a system based on the concept of the poverty line. The improved pension program guarantees that the aggregate income of any elderly or permanently and totally disabled wartime veteran or elderly or permanently and totally disabled surviving spouse of a wartime veteran will not fall below the poverty line. For most such veterans and survivors, the improved pension program will provide a supplement to other income in order to bring their aggregate incomes up to the appropriate income standards. For those persons who do not have any other income, the improved pension program will provide income-maintenance payments at the income standard. Generally, veterans and survivors whose incomes from other sources exceed the income standards will not be eligible for improved pension. This reflects the Committee's judgment that the purpose of the need-based pension program is to protect from poverty levels of subsistence those wartime veterans and their survivors who are unable to provide for themselves by reason of age or disability. Therefore, to the extent that such persons have income from other sources to provide for their basic needs, such income will generally be counted so as to reduce, dollar for dollar, entitlement to improved pension.

EXCLUSIONS FROM COUNTABLE INCOME

Although the income-standard approach of the Committee bill requires that all income from whatever source derived generally be considered in determining an individual's improved pension entitlement, the bill also provides for certain exclusions from countable income.

The current program provides for an extensive list of such exclusions. These may be classified as follows: First, the exclusion of certain income regularly received or a proportion thereof, such as the exclusion of all of a veteran's spouse's earned income and 10 percent of all retirement income; second, the exclusion of certain "one-time" receipts, such as fire insurance policy proceeds; and third, the exclusion of amounts equal to amounts paid out for certain expenses made necessary by events beyond the control of the pensioner, for example, unreimbursed burial or unusual medical expenses.

Certain exclusions permitted under current law are clearly equitable and warranted and are included under the improved pension program, either as they appear in current law or with modifications. Others do not comport with the essential principle that dollars available for ordinary living expenses should be counted in determining improved pension entitlement and are not continued under the new program. The bill also provides for certain exclusions which have no counterpart in the current program. Overall, the bill contains substantially fewer exclusions from income than current law.

With respect to income regularly received, the bill continues the exclusion, permitted under current law, of income received from public or private relief or welfare organizations. The amount of such income is generally predicated on a recipient's other income, such as VA pension. Under the Supplemental Security Income (SSI) program, for example, "income based on need" is counted so as to reduce SSI benefits dollar for dollar (42 U.S.C. 1382a(b)(2)(A)). To count income from such organizations for improved pension purposes would result in a series of back-and-forth adjustments in both pension and welfare payments. This exclusion eliminates such adjustment difficulties.

Regularly received nonemployment income, including retirement income, would be counted dollar for dollar under the Committee bill, because those dollars are available for maintenance. Thus, the current-law exclusion of 10 percent of all retirement income would not be included in the improved pension program.

The bill also does not include the present program's exclusion of all of a veteran's spouse's earned income or $1,200 of the spouse's total income, whichever is the greater. This exclusion, as has been noted, is an anomaly in a need-based income-maintenance program because it permits the payment of pension dollars to families without regard to their need.

Nevertheless, to count all income derived from current work would create another anomaly—that of a federally-sponsored need-based program which discourages work. To some extent, the present program acts as a work disincentive with respect to its primary beneficiary—the veteran. Under current law, none of the earned income of a veteran is excluded. Thus, elderly veterans who must depend on the pension program for income support are heavily penalized if they engage in occasional or part-time work, and a catastrophically-disabled younger veteran who might seek to return to the work force may be discouraged from doing so by the risk of losing the income security that pension provides.

Therefore, the bill provides for the partial exclusion, within certain limits, of income derived from the current work of the veteran and the veteran's spouse and children and the surviving spouse and surviving children. The provisions relating to the current-work income exclusions are more fully described below.

The bill incorporates the exclusions permitted under current law which recognize that certain moneys received by a pensioner are not available for living expenses. Thus, the bill provides for the exclusion of the entire proceeds of fire insurance policies and income realized from the disposition of real or personal property other than in the course of a business, because of moneys so received are generally needed and used to replace the property destroyed or sold. Where those amounts are sizable and are not used to replace the property, they would be considered in the net worth determinations required of all participants in the improved pension program.

In addition, the Committee bill provides for the exclusion, permitted under current law, of moneys received from a joint bank account by reason of the death of the other joint owner. This exclusion recognizes that the acquisition of exclusive control over a bank account, formerly held jointly, does not add to the amount of total income available for support.

As under current law, the Committee bill also provides for the exclusion of amounts equal to amounts paid out for certain expenses that are occasioned by events beyond the control of the pensioner and reduce the amount of income available for meeting ordinary living expenses. Thus, amounts equal to amounts paid by survivors for the just debts of a deceased veteran and amounts paid by veterans or survivors for the last illness and burial of a veteran or a veteran's spouse, or for unusual medical expenses, would be excludable.

Other exclusions under the Committee bill are for certain expenditures necessary for the veteran or surviving spouse to pursue a course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training or, in the case of a catastrophically-disabled veteran or surviving spouse who is employed or enrolled in a course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training, to enable that person to travel to and from his or her workplace, school, or training site.

The discussions which follow provide more detailed explanations of those exclusions in the Committee bill which either do not have any counterpart in the current program or would operate in a different fashion.

Unusual medical expenses

Unusual medical expenses would be deductible from the pensioner's annual income to the extent that such expenses annually are in excess of $100 or 5 percent of annual income. Unusual medical expenses under current law are excludable from countable income, and by regulation (38 C.F.R. 3.262 (l)), the Veterans' Administration has defined "unusual" to mean those expenses exceeding 5 percent of annual income paid for the pension beneficiary's health-care needs and those of certain close relatives. The VA permits a deduction of amounts paid for medical insurance premiums (including Medicare), physical examinations and diagnostic tests, dentures and eyeglasses, and home health services. * * *

By providing for a $100 deductible, the unreimbursed medical expenses exclusion generally makes the value of this exclusion equitable with respect to all pensioners under the improved pension program. For example, a person with $3,100 in nonpension income and $800 in unreimbursed medical expenses would be permitted to offset $700 against his nonpension income; under the current program, the offset would be limited to such expenses in excess of 5 percent of $3,100—$155—or $645, but a person with, for example, $1,200 in nonpension income and similar medical expenditures would be permitted to offset $740 (excess over 5 percent of $1,200—$60).

The exclusion of such amounts in excess of 5 percent of nonpension income, if that amount is less than $100, extends this very equitable exclusion to those persons whose annual nonpension income is less than $2,000, and for whom a "5-percent" deductible would prove more advantageous.

The unreimbursed medical expenses exclusion would apply to the expenses reasonably incurred for the health-care needs of the veteran, surviving spouse, and surviving child, as well as the family members for whom the veteran or surviving spouse receives increased improved pension. In the case of a surviving child who is not in the custody of persons legally responsible for the child's support, the exclusion would apply to the child's income. In the case of a child living with persons legally responsible for the child's support, the exclusion would apply to the income of the child considered together with the income of the responsible persons.

Such expenses would be disallowed if they are incurred after 30 days or more following notice to an improved pension beneficiary that health-care services of the same kind as those for which an exclusion had previously been granted were readily available at a VA facility if the VA further determines that VA health-care services continued to be available to the beneficiary. In almost all regions of the country, VA health care facilities are maintained for and available to meet the health needs of veterans receiving pension, and this provision would help to ensure that the VA facilities available to them are appropriately and economically utilized.

The Committee bill provides for an exclusion to benefits veterans or survivors who receive income from current work, defined as earned income within the meaning of sections 401(c)(2)(A) and 911(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 401(c)(2)(A) and 911(b)) * * *:

Thus, current-work income generally refers to the wages or salary derived from a person's current employment, including self-employment, as opposed to retirement benefits or other income based on past employment, such as social security benefits and civil service annuities, and income derived from nonemployment sources such as interest, dividends, and capital gains.

For veterans and survivors, generally, this exclusion provides that a recipient of improved pension who engages in current work will be entitled to exclude the first $780, plus one-half of the remainder of his or her current-work income, from annual countable income. If the veteran or surviving spouse is in need of regular aid and attendance, the current-work income exclusion would be the first $1,560, plus one-half of the remainder of annual current-work income. In the case of a veteran entitled to improved pension at an increased rate by reason of marriage or children, the exclusion will apply generally to all the current-work income of the veteran and the family members on whose behalf the veteran is receiving increased improved pension. Similarly, the exclusion will apply generally to all the current-work income of the surviving spouse and the children on whose behalf the surviving spouse is receiving increased improved pension. * * *

In connection with these provisions, it should be remembered that the veteran is eligible for smaller and smaller amounts of improved pension as current-work income nears the cutoff point. This ensures that improved pension would provide the greatest benefit to these most in need, while avoiding a work disincentive.

In this way the current-work income exclusion in the Committee bill differs substantially from the exclusion under current law of all of a veteran's spouse's earned income (or $1,200, whichever is the greater). The current-law exclusion has resulted in the anomaly of thousands of "needy" veterans receiving pension even though their household incomes are far above the poverty threshold.

Consistent with the Committee's view that the new program should not discourage work, the current-work income exclusion would also apply to the income of a veteran's spouse or dependents, which would be especially beneficial in situations where the nature of the veteran's disability precludes employment. The increased current-work income exclusion of $1,560, plus one-half of the remainder, in the situation where the veteran's disability is so severe that he or she is in need of regular aid and attendance recognizes the catastrophic effect which such a disability may have on the family and the increased income which may be required to provide for the family's basic needs.

In the Committee's view, it is extremely important to avoid * * * useful, remunerative employment on a part-time or occasional basis among those over 65 and to avoid provisions whose effect would be the discouragement of efforts to contribute to one's own support.

In the case of a veteran or surviving spouse who has become permanently and totally disabled before reaching the traditional age of retirement, these provisions ensure that such a person's efforts to become wholly or partially self-sustaining are not discouraged by a program which by its structure builds in a disincentive to such efforts. If improved pension benefits were reduced dollar for dollar by each dollar of current-work income, the risk to such a person of losing the income security provided by the improved pension program would greatly discourage a veteran from undergoing the strain, discomfort, and other tribulations which seriously disabled persons often encounter in attempting employment, for the financial incentive to earn these dollars would be eliminated.

In the Committee's view, it is extremely important to avoid discouraging seriously disabled persons from attempting rehabilitation. The Committee bill is designed to further the strong, clear national policy—as reflected in the Rehabilitation Act of 1973—a policy of commitment to removing the barriers preventing seriously disabled persons from participating in the economy as wage earners.

The current-work income exclusion is derived from principles generally applicable to Federal income-maintenance programs designed to offset the risks of disability, old age, or the loss of the family breadwinner. Most of these programs—such as food stamps and SSI—are need-based, in the sense that the other income available to the recipient reduces entitlement; and the Committee bill exclusion itself—$780, plus one-half of the remainder—is patterned after the SSI earned-income disregard.

The largest of the programs, social security, although it responds to need, has never been regarded as need-based. In that program, as amended by the Social Security Amendments of 1977 (Public Law 95-216), a person aged 65 to 72 who is retired under social security may earn from current work as much as $4,000 in a year before any deduction is made from his or her social security benefits. For earnings above $4,000, $1 is withheld for each $2 of earnings. A social security recipient age 72 or over, however, is not subject to any reduction. In 1977 these provisions were liberalized and extended so that in 1979, a social security retiree will be able to earn as much as $4,500 before any reduction is made; in 1980, $5,000; in 1981, $5,500; and in 1982, $6,000, with automatic adjustments in years after 1982. In 1982, the age at which such earnings would be exempt from any reduction will be lowered from 72 to 70. These provisions, which commanded widespread support in the Congress, respond to the changing trends in our society recognizing the social and economic importance of the work of persons who have passed the traditional retirement age of 65 but who continue to work. The elimination of laws requiring mandatory retirement at specific ages—as in Public Law 95-256, enacted on April 6, 1978—also illustrates this significant trend.

Current-work income exclusion for dependent and surviving children

Under the Committee bill, the current-work income of any dependent or surviving child would be excluded from countable income up to the amount of gross income ($2,950) an unmarried individual may have before being required to file a Federal income tax return under section 6012(a)(1)(A)(i) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6012(a)(1)(A)(i)). * * *

Current-work income exceeding that amount (currently $2,950) would be subject to the general current-work income exclusion of $780, plus one-half of the remainder (or, in the case of a veteran or surviving spouse in need of regular aid and attendance, $1,560, plus one-half of the remainder). Thus, a dependent or surviving child might have as much as $3,730 ($2,950 plus $780) or more in annual current-work income before any reduction in improved pension benefits would occur. Any dependent or surviving child pursuing a postsecondary course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training would also be entitled to an exclusion from such child's current-work income of amounts paid by the child for educational or vocational rehabilitation or training expenses, such as tuition, fees, books, and materials. This exclusion would be cumulative with the $2,950 exclusion described above and is intended to ensure that no child is penalized for working to earn money needed for his or her schooling.

Because most children under the age of 18 do not have annual income from current work exceeding $2,950, the exclusion of this amount will prevent almost all dependent and surviving children under the age of 18 from having to account for their current-work income for improved pension purposes. Dependent and surviving children generally will have the security of knowing that they may retain all of their own earnings, and that their efforts to move toward self-sufficiency are not penalized.

However, in the event that such a child must file a Federal income tax return—and therefore must account for his or her earnings for tax purposes—the veteran, surviving spouse, or surviving child, as the case may be, would be required to report the child's annual current-work income to the extent that it exceeds $2,950.

Under existing law, the earned income of a surviving child is not counted in determining whether the child's income exceeds the income limitation, and no account is taken of children's earnings in determining the eligibility of a veteran or surviving spouse. Those provisions have assured that dependent and surviving children who enter the world of work are not penalized for their efforts. The provisions in the Committee bill applicable to such children's current-work income are also designed to prevent the improved pension program from discouraging the children's efforts to work and from having to keep records of their current-work income—except for the kind of records required for Federal income tax purposes—but the provision of a "cap" ensures that in the rare case in which a child under 18 has current-work income exceeding $2,950 annually, the general principles governing the treatment of income under the improved pension program are applied.

Surviving children remain eligible for pension up to the age of 23 as long as they are attending school, and the discussion above is equally applicable to the current-work income of children ages 18 to 23, except that, of course, it is much more likely that those young adults will have current-work income exceeding $2,950 annually.

Another exclusion relates to the expenses incurred by a veteran or surviving spouse pursuing a program of education or vocational rehabilitation or training. These persons would be entitled to exclude from annual income amounts equal to amounts paid (including those paid from education, training, or rehabilitation allowances provided for under title 38) in the previous calendar year for the costs of such education or vocational rehabilitation or training, such as tuition, fees, books, and materials. In the case of veterans or surviving spouses in need of regular aid and attendance, unusual transportation expenses for traveling back and forth to the place of instruction or rehabilitation would also be deductible, to the extent that they exceed the reasonable expenses which would have been incurred by a nondisabled person using an appropriate means of transportation, including public transportation if available.

This exclusion reflects the Committee's view that the incursion of such expenses into a pension beneficiary's limited resources may be a substantial deterrent to efforts to achieve a measure of independence through education or vocational rehabilitation or training. Particularly in the case of younger, catastrophically disabled veterans or surviving spouses—such as those who are blind or paraplegic—this provision furthers the Committee's intention that the improved pension program not operate as a disincentive to a disabled adult beneficiary's efforts to regain a measure of self-sufficiency.

The same intent also underlies the exclusion from annual income of unusual transportation expenses, other than those that are reimbursed, incurred by a veteran or surviving spouse who is in need of regular aid and attendance in traveling back and forth to such person's place of employment. As previously noted, the disabilities which create the need for the additional income support provided by the "aid-and-attendance" income standard are severe, in many instances, catastrophic, and they are not easily overcome. In many instances, of course, a person so severely disabled as to require regular aid and attendance is terminally ill or so completely overwhelmed by the nature of his or her incapacitation that employment is not possible. In other cases, the presence of a severe and permanent disability is not an absolute barrier to employment; nor, in the Committee's view, should it be.

Severely disabled persons who attempt employment meet many obstacles, however, which require courage and motivation to overcome. Our society has become increasingly sensitive to the difficulties they encounter—such as in traveling back and forth to the place of employment and gaining physical access to the worksite—but some difficulties cannot be eradicated entirely. By providing for the exclusion of unusual transportation expenses incurred by such persons in traveling back and forth to work, the bill would help to eliminate one barrier for such persons, who must often rely for travel on specially adapted vehicles or other special means of transportation. Like the exclusion of unusual transportation expenses as an educational cost, this exclusion would be of an amount equal to the amount spent in the previous calendar year to the extent that it exceeds the reasonable commuting expenses which would have been incurred by a nondisabled person using an appropriate means of transportation for such purpose, including public transportation if available.

NET WORTH DETERMINATIONS

Under existing law and regulations, no specific dollar limit is placed on the amount of a beneficiary's or prospective beneficiary's net worth in order to determine eligibility for pension. Rather, the VA's authority is to deny or discontinue pension benefits if it determines, under all the circumstances, including the consideration of the beneficiary's income, that some portion of the net worth could reasonably be used for his or her maintenance. This permits individualized determinations in each case. The Committee bill continues this approach for improved pension beneficiaries.

Consistent with the provisions of the Committee bill requiring that the income of veterans and survivors receiving improved pension be considered together with the income of the dependent family members for whom they are receiving increased improved pension benefits, and, in the case of surviving children, the incomes of persons with whom such children reside who are legally responsible for their support, the Committee bill requires evaluations of the estates—the "net worth"—or such persons. "Net worth" generally means the value of a person's assets, such as a home, an automobile, bank savings and checking accounts, stocks, bonds, or real property, minus the amount of liabilities such as mortgages and other debts. Under existing law, net worth determinations are required of pension applicants and recipients, but not of a veteran's or surviving spouse's dependent family members.

By regulation (38 C.F.R. 3.263(b)), the VA excludes from net worth determinations the entire value of a recipient's home and reasonable personal effects. The Committee bill is not designed to change the VA's interpretation permitting this reasonable exclusion, which is generally consistent with similar exclusions in other need-based income-maintenance systems such as SSI. In addition, the Committee bill would expressly authorize the exclusion from any child's net worth of reasonable amounts set aside for the child's educational or other similarly worthwhile vocational goals.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF REDUCTION OR TERMINATION OF IMPROVED PENSION BENEFITS

The Committee bill provides that the effective date of a reduction or termination of improved pension benefits resulting from an increase in income or net worth would be the end of the month in which the increase occurs. Under existing law, such effective date is the end of the calendar year in which the increase occurs.

Although beneficially intended, this provision—known as the "end of the year rule"—may cause unanticipated hardship, as in the situation where a person receives an increase in income early in the year—for example, February—and increases his or her standard of living as a result. No reduction in pension is made until the following January—and the decline which then occurs in aggregate income may seem almost punitive. For the 10-month period, however, pension benefits were predicated on the person's income prior to the increase—and consequently, during that period, not truly reflective of need. By changing the "end of the year rule" to an "end of the month" rule, the Committee bill would thus prevent the new program from countenancing a practice so at variance with the general principles of need-based income maintenance systems, and assures that the payment of improved pension benefits is commensurate with need.

Reporting requirements and exemptions from annual reporting

The Committee bill requires, as a condition of eligibility for improved pension benefits, that applicants and recipients provide information relating to their incomes and net worths, and the incomes and net worths of persons on behalf of whom they are applying for or receiving increased improved pension. A surviving child would be required to report his or her income (other than current-work income that is less than $2,950) and net worth as well as the incomes and net worths of persons with whom he or she resides who are legally responsible for the child's support. Such information would be required of all persons applying for or electing improved pension benefits, and annually thereafter in order to verify eligibility. In addition, the VA is given discretionary authority to require such information at any time. Current law provides for similar reporting requirements, except that the incomes of dependent children are not required to be reported, nor are the net worths of dependent family members.

Material increases in income or net worth or changes in the status or number of dependent family members would also be required, as under current law, to be reported promptly. These requirements are essential to assure proper payments of improved pension benefits and to minimize overpayments, the recoupment of which is administratively burdensome and may create undue personal hardship.

The Committee bill provides for an express exemption, under regulations to be prescribed by the VA, from the annual reporting requirement for persons in categories of persons all of whose nonpension income is regularly received from a Federal program. Under existing law, persons aged 72 years or older who have been receiving pension benefits for 2 years or more and all surviving children are excepted from the requirement of annual reporting.

The present exemption for surviving children is appropriate because under current law the child's earned income is entirely excludable for pension purposes, and it is believed that most such children's countable incomes do not exceed the income limitation. However, the provisions in the Committee bill applicable to children's income render this blanket exemption inappropriate—although, of course, the current-work income of dependent or surviving children would not be required to be reported unless it exceeds $2,950 annually.

The present exemption for persons aged 72 or over is justifiable to the extent that such persons live on fixed monthly incomes but is equally justifiable with respect to persons living on fixed monthly incomes who have not reached the age of 72.

Under the bill, the VA would be authorized to provide by regulation for the exemption from annual reporting of persons in categories of persons all of whose nonpension income is regularly received and derived from a Federal program such as social security, civil service retirement, or railroad retirement. In exercising this authority, the Administrator would generally relieve most persons in the improved pension program who are age 72 or over, as well as many others who have not reached that age, from the burden of annual income reporting.

ELECTION OF BENEFITS UNDER THE IMPROVED PENSION PROGRAM

The Committee bill provides that, with the exception of persons residing outside the United States on the effective date of the new program, any person receiving pension benefits under existing law may elect to receive benefits under the improved pension program and that, if improved pension is paid at any time pursuant to such an election, the election would be irrevocable. Thus, persons receiving pension based on service during the Indian wars or the Spanish-American War, those receiving "old law" pension, and those receiving pension under the current pension program based on service during World War I, World War II, the Korean conflict, or the Vietnam era, would be able to elect the new program. The election would be irrevocable only if improved pension is actually paid to such a person.

Under the bill, veterans and survivors who elect improved pension benefits within 3 months of the bill's effective date (October 1, 1978) would receive improved pension benefits retroactive to the effective date to the extent that those benefits exceed pension benefits already paid to such persons.

Under existing provisions of title 38, United States Code, pension benefits (and other income-maintenance benefits under laws administered by the VA) are generally retroactive to the date of application. However, if the benefits are based on the death or disability of a person, the benefits are retroactive to the date of such death or disability, but only if the application is received within 1 year of such date. These provisions ensure that pension benefits fulfill their intended purpose of income maintenance and prevent "windfalls", and the bill makes no changes in those very necessary provisions. By authorizing limited retroactivity for pensioners who make timely elections, the bill encourages prompt elections by those who would be benefited.

PROTECTION OF EXISTING PROGRAM RIGHTS—"GRANDFATHERING"

The Committee bill would make no changes in the existing programs other than to provide that no person (other than a person who is residing outside the 50 States and the District of Columbia on the effective date of the new law) who applies for pension benefits on or after the effective date of the new law may receive benefits under any of those programs.

Also, the Committee bill expressly provides that none of its provisions is intended to affect the existing rights of any person receiving benefits under the current pension program or the "old law" program, as in effect on the day before the effective date of the new programs, to receive benefits for which he or she is eligible. Moreover, if an application is pending on the effective date and the person is found to be eligible on the basis of such application for one of the existing programs, he or she may receive benefits under that program in lieu of improved-pension benefits. This provision is intended to extend the opportunity so to elect participation in an existing program only with respect to the initial adjudication (including appeals) of the application which was pending on the effective date of the new programs and that any subsequent reopening of a case should not be considered action on the original application.

Under the improved program, persons with annual countable income above the applicable income standards would not be eligible for the new program. Thus, these provisions—known as "grandfather clauses"—ensure that no veteran or survivor currently receiving benefits will have those benefits reduced or terminated because of the enactment of the new program.

* * * * *

It may be anticipated that in the first years following enactment of the Committee bill, there will be cases in which recipients of pension benefits under the current program will become ineligible to continue under that program because of cost-of-living increases in their social security incomes. However, any of those persons whose countable nonpension incomes are below the applicable income standards provided for under the Committee bill would be eligible for benefits under the improved pension program.

IMPROVED DEPENDENCY AND INDEMNITY COMPENSATION FOR SURVIVING PARENTS

The Committee bill provides for an improved program of dependency and indemnity compensation (DIC) benefits for the needy surviving parents of veterans who died as a result of their service-connected disabilities. The improved DIC program, closely modeled after the improved pension program, corrects anomalies, inequities, and inconsistencies in the existing parents' DIC program which are very similar to those identified in the existing pension program.

Background

The parents' DIC program was established in 1956 under Public Law 84-881 and replaced the earlier "death compensation" program. Under existing law, parents' DIC is a need-based income maintenance program for the surviving parents of veterans who on or after January 1, 1957, died in service or after service as a result of service-connected disabilities. Eligibility is limited to parents whose annual income does not exceed specified income limitations, and benefits are determined pursuant to rate-decrement-income-limitation formulas similar to those adopted for the pension program. Although parents' DIC is a service-connected program, it is need-based and benefits are established in a manner similar to that used in the pension program; as a result, laws providing for cost-of-living increases in the pension program have applied the same percentage increases to the maximum rates and the annual income limitations of the parents' DIC program. The previous pension-reform measure, S. 2635 (passed by the Senate in 1975), would have restructured that program along the lines of the new pension program envisioned by that measure.

Many of the inequities, anomalies, and inconsistencies which have developed in the pension program also occur in the present parents' DIC program. The current maximum benefits payable to a parent with no other income are extremely low—$152 per month to one parent or $102 per month to each parent if the parents are living together. In the case of a remarried parent, the incomes of the parent and the spouse are combined to determine the DIC amount payable to the parent. DIC benefits payable to such a remarried parent are the greater of (1) the amount payable to a single parent (annual income limitation of $3,770) or (2) the amount payable to each parent if two parents are living together (annual income limitation of $5,070). Rate-decrement-income-limitation formulas like those in the existing pension program are used to determine actual benefit rates. If the parent's countable income is within the income limitation, but exceeds the amount which would yield any benefit under the formula, the DIC payment cannot be less than $5 monthly.

A parent in need of regular aid and attendance receives an additional $79 per month. Annual income determinations, income exclusions, and annual reporting requirements are similar to those in the existing pension program. However, no net worth determination is required of DIC parents.

The theory underlying the payment of DIC benefits to surviving parents is also related to the loss of income support which may result from the veteran's death. In former times, the legal obligation of an adult to support aging parents who were no longer able to support themselves—particularly, one's widowed mother—was sanctioned under most State laws. Even where such laws were not vigorously enforced, many persons assumed this obligation. Moreover, the loss of a son in service was recognized not only as a personal tragedy but, to some extent, an economic sacrifice. Thus, laws providing for "death compensation" to benefit such a veteran's survivors included not only surviving spouses and children but also parents. However, in recognition that the legal obligation of an adult to support needy parents was less clear than such a person's obligation to support a spouse or child, death compensation benefits payable to surviving parents required a showing that the parent would have been dependent on the veteran had the veteran lived. Once such dependency was established, the parent was entitled to receive death compensation in fixed monthly amounts without regard to need.

In 1956, as noted, Congress supplanted the death compensation program with DIC. Death compensation payments were continued to the parent of any veteran who died before January 1, 1957; the needy parents of a veteran dying after that date became eligible for the new need-based DIC program under which no dependency test was required.

Under the Committee bill, a program of improved DIC benefits would be established for the surviving parent or parents of a veteran who died as a result of service-connected disability, if such veteran provided one-half or more of the support of such parent or parents during the 1-year period immediately preceding the veteran's death. This requirement of actual dependency on the veteran by the parent is similar to the dependency requirement of the Social Security Act which must be met before social security survivors' benefits may be paid to the surviving parent of a deceased wage earner.

Under the Committee bill, the maximum annual rates payable under the improved DIC program (based on improved pension rates) would be as follows:

TABLE 16.—Improved DIC rates for surviving parents

|---|---|
| One parent or each parent, if the parents are living apart | $3,240 |
| Two parents living together | 4,284 |
| One parent (or each parent, if the parents are living apart) in need of regular aid and attendance | 5,340 |
| Two parents living together, one of whom is in need of regular aid and attendance | 6,384 |
| Two parents living together, both of whom are in need of regular aid and attendance | 8,484 |

The increased rates in cases in which both parents (living together) are in need of regular aid and attendance reflect the Committee's view that each parent is a "primary beneficiary".

The substantially increased benefit levels and the requirement of a dependency test—measured by the receipt of one-half or more support from the deceased veteran during the 1-year period immediately preceding the veteran's death—reflect the Committee's judgment that the Government's obligation to the parent of a veteran who died as a result of service-connected disability is two-fold: First, to acknowledge the moral obligation of the veteran by continuing to support his or her dependent parents in cases where the veteran had actually assumed such an obligation and provide support; and second, in such cases, to assure such parents of income maintenance above the poverty guidelines.

Like pensioners, DIC parents who have social security income may receive annual reductions in DIC benefits attributable to a social security cost-of-living increase; the effect of DIC rate increases has been, in many cases, merely to diminish the size of the reduction, as it is in the current pension program.

Under the improved parents' DIC program, annual income determinations, income exclusions (including the current-work income exclusions), net worth determinations, and annual reporting requirements would be similar to those under the improved pension program. In the case of a remarried parent, the income of the spouse—if the parent is living with such spouse—would be considered as the income of the parent, to the extent reasonably available to or for the parent. The net worth of the remarried parent's spouse would be considered in a similar fashion.

Parents currently receiving DIC or death compensation benefits would be entitled to elect improved benefits if they meet the eligibility requirements and reside in one of the 50 States or the District of Columbia. Persons not residing in the United States, and those who are ineligible for improved parents' DIC, may continue to receive benefits, if they continue to be eligible therefor, under the provisions of law in effect on the day before the effective date of the new program. Also, parents residing outside the 50 States or the District of Columbia on the effective date of the new program who become eligible on or after that date would be entitled to apply for and receive benefits under those existing provisions if they continuously reside outside the 50 States and the District of Columbia and they remain eligible under such provisions.

IMPROVED PENSION AND PARENTS' DEPENDENCY AND INDEMNITY COMPENSATION RATES AUTOMATICALLY INDEXED TO CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Annual automatic cost-of-living adjustments

The Committee bill includes provisions, known as "indexing provisions" under which annual automatic cost-of-living increases are made in benefit levels in order to prevent the value of benefits from being eroded by inflation. These increases would take place annually at the same time and by the same percentage as cost-of-living increases in social security benefits. Each of the maximum annual rates—income standards—would be increased by the same percentage. * * *

* * * * *

The bill requires that the new annual rates be published in the Federal Register at the same time that the Social Security Administration is required to publish certain information relating to the percentage increase to be applied to social security benefits.

The Committee bill would require that the Veterans' Administration, in similar fashion, publish the new annual rates of improved pension—in any year in which there is to be a cost-of-living increase in social security benefits—in the Federal Register at the same time as the social security information is published.

Some reservations have been expressed that the indexing provisions—by removing the necessity for the Veterans' Affairs Committees of both Houses of Congress to give attention annually to pension rate increases to counter the effects of inflation—would diminish the role of the pension program in the Committee's annual deliberations. The Committee would like to stress its belief that such reservations are unwarranted and that it intends no future diminution of the emphasis placed on the pension program in its work. Rather, the indexing provisions will give the Committee a better opportunity to examine in greater depth the operations of the improved program and any future proposals for its modification.

The indexing provisions are equally applicable to the improved dependency and indemnity compensation (DIC) program. Like pensioners, these surviving parents are often living on fixed incomes particularly vulnerable to inflation, and the problem of annual reductions in DIC benefits attributable to a social security cost-of-living increase occurs in this program as well. Under the improved DIC program for surviving parents, no parent who has social security income as well as improved DIC will suffer any such reduction attributable to social security cost-of-living increases. Rather, such a parent will be assured of annual cost-of-living increases in his or her improved DIC income, as will parents whose entire income consists of improved DIC payments.

The Committee bill would also provide for annual automatic increases, by the same cost-of-living percentage applied to rates, in the dollar amounts of the exclusions of current-work income. Under the bill, these are $780 in the case of veterans, surviving spouses, and surviving parents not in need of regular aid and attendance and $1,560 in the case of veterans, surviving spouses, and surviving parents in such need. The $780 and $1,560 exclusions (plus one-half of the remainder) also applies to the income from current work earned by any dependent or surviving child with earnings that exceed the amount of income required to file a Federal income tax return. These amounts—$780 and $1,560—would be annually adjusted, and the increased amounts would be published in the Federal Register at the same time as the new annual rates of improved pension and improved DIC. Thus, the special benefit provided by this exclusion would not be diminished by inflation.

ANNUAL REDETERMINATION TO PREVENT REDUCTIONS IN IMPROVED PENSION BENEFITS ATTRIBUTABLE TO SOCIAL SECURITY COST-OF-LIVING INCREASES

During the month in which the increased annual rates become effective, which is the month prior to which increased benefits would actually be paid, the VA would be required to redetermine the amount of improved pension benefits to be paid to those recipients who also have social security benefits or other Federal benefits which are indexed in accord with social security benefits. The VA would be required to annualize the new social security monthly rate and, based on the new annualized social security rate and the increased annual maximum rate of improved pensions, redetermining a recipient's improved pension entitlement accordingly. * * *

COST-OF-LIVING INCREASE AND OTHER IMPROVEMENTS IN PENSION PAYABLE TO INSTITUTIONALIZED SINGLE VETERANS

The Committee bill provides for a cost-of-living increase in the maximum pension benefits payable to a veteran who has no dependent family members and who is institutionalized at VA expense in a domiciliary, nursing home, or hospital.

Under the existing provisions of section 3203(a) of title 38, the maximum pension payable to such a veteran may not exceed $50 per month after the end of the second full calendar month following the month of admission for treatment or care. If the veteran has been readmitted for treatment or care within 6 months following the termination of a period of care which lasted not less than 2 full calendar months, the maximum pension payable after the month of such readmission cannot exceed $50. A reduction in pension benefits to such veterans is appropriate since all such veterans receive their essential income-maintenance needs—food, shelter, and medical care—at VA expense. The limited amount payable is provided for out-of-pocket expenses for personal and recreational expenses.

The provision for a reduction in benefits in such cases was adopted in Public Law 86–211, the Veterans' Pension Act of 1959. Public Law 93–177 increased the maximum pension payment to an institutionalized veteran without dependent family members from $30 per month to $50, the present maximum.

Under the Committee bill, the maximum pension payable to a veteran residing in a VA domiciliary facility could not exceed $60 per month after 2 months of such residence. If the veteran is receiving VA hospital or nursing home care, the Committee bill would permit such a veteran to receive benefits without any reduction for 3 months following the month of his or her admission for such care, and for an additional 3 months if it is determined that the veteran's return to the community would be facilitated by such a continuation of the full rate. After 3 months or 6 months, as the case may be, the maximum pension could not exceed $60 per month. This provision reflects the recognition of the fact that in many instances, a veteran's desire to return to the community may be frustrated if during his or her hospital or nursing home stay, bills for necessary expenses, such as rent, have not been paid.

The Committee bill also provides a cost-of-living increase in the maximum pension payable to a veteran with no dependent family members who is readmitted for care within 6 months after a period of care lasting 2 full calendar months or more. In such cases, pension benefits otherwise payable would be reduced after the veteran's readmission (effective with the following month's benefit payment) to a maximum of $60 per month.

COST ESTIMATE

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the excerpts just inserted into the RECORD do not include the Congressional Budget Office estimate of the costs of S. 2384 because, since filing the committee report on July 17, the committee received, on July 24, a revised CBO estimate. The revised CBO estimate indicates that the 5-year budget authority requirements resulting from the enactment of S. 2384 would be $693,700,000 in fiscal year 1979; $1,018,500,000 in fiscal year 1980; $1,441,900,000 in fiscal year 1981; $1,922,400,000 in fiscal year 1982; and $2,438,200,000 in fiscal year 1983.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point the July 24 revised CBO estimate, including detailed breakdowns and a discussion of the costs of the committee bill over the next 5 fiscal years.

The CBO cost estimate follows:

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE COST ESTIMATE

1. Bill number: S. 2384.

2. Bill title: The Veterans' and Survivors' Pension Improvement Act.

3. Bill status: As ordered reported by the Senate Committee on Veterans Affairs, March 23, 1978.

4. Bill purpose: The bill would establish a new non-service-connected pension program for the veterans and survivors of the Mexican Border Period, World War I, World War II, the Korean Conflict, and the Vietnam Era. The new program, which would take effect on October 1, 1978, would operate concurrently with the existing program. Those individuals who are receiving benefits under the existing program on the effective date of the bill would have the option of selecting whichever program offered them the higher benefit. Election of the reformed program, however, would be irrevocable, and all new cases would only be eligible for the reformed pension.

The maximum benefit levels set by S. 2384 would be $3,240 annually for a veteran with no dependents and $4,284 for a veteran with one dependent. Two levels of benefits would be instituted for surviving spouses. A surviving spouse who is disabled or over the age of 64 would be paid at the same rate as a veteran. If the surviving spouse does not meet these requirements, however, she/he would be paid at rates that are two-thirds those for veterans ($2,172 annually for a surviving spouse without dependents, and $2,868 for a surviving spouse with a child). The benefit level for all pensioners would be increased by $660 a year for each dependent after the first. All rates under the reformed pension program would be adjusted annually for increases in the cost-of-living using the same percentage by which social security benefits are raised. Such increases would be effective at the same time as social security increases.

The treatment of non-pension income under the reformed program would be based on the family-income concept, whereby the incomes of all beneficiaries in the family are treated the same. Under current law, for example, social security survivors' benefits paid to dependent children of surviving spouses or to children alone are not counted against their pension payment, on the theory that this money is considered a trust for the child's education. The reformed pension, however, would treat the income of children in the same fashion as the income of other family members, with the exception that the earnings of a child would only be considered to the extent that they exceed the minimum wages that a child must have before being required to file a Federal income tax return (currently $2,905).

Many of the exclusions of non-pension income permitted under current law would not be allowed in the reformed program. The exclusion of 10 percent of retirement or annuity income would no longer be permitted. The current provisions dealing with the income of a veteran's spouse would also be discontinued. A new exclusion, however, pertaining to current-work income would be established by S. 2384. The new provision would allow $780 of the earnings of all beneficiaries in the family to be excluded from countable income plus one-half of the remaining earnings. For veterans and surviving spouses who receive aid and attendance allowances, the current-work income disregard would be $1,560 plus one-half of the remainder.

Whereas the current pension program uses a formula rate structure to determine the payment level, the reformed program would employ the single-variable method now utilized by the Supplemental Security Income program. The pension payment would be calculated by subtracting countable income from the maximum benefit level.

S. 2384 would also establish a new program, very similar to the reformed pension, for parents of deceased veterans receiving Disability and Indemnity Compensation (DIC). Unlike the present requirements for DIC parents, however, new cases to the reformed DIC parents program would be required to show that they had been receiving one-half or more of their support from the veteran. The maximum benefit level for a single parent would be the same as that for a veteran alone, and two parents living together would receive the same rate as a veteran with one dependent.

The reformed pension program would only be made available to individuals residing within the 50 states and the District of Columbia. The current program would continue unchanged for all eligible individuals residing elsewhere.

5. Cost estimate.

| Net required budget authority | 571.3 | 802.3 | 1,120.1 | 1,482.7 | 1,866.0 |

The costs of this bill fall within budget function 700. The offsetting savings in the AFDC and SSI programs apply to function 600 and the offsetting savings in Medicaid to function 550.

6. Basis for estimate:

Cost model for VA benefit costs:

The gross program costs of this bill were estimated through the use of a microsimulation model. The data base for this computer model is a one percent sample of all veteran and surviving spouse cases receiving pension under the currently active VA pension program. The sample, which includes the records of nearly 20,000 cases, was extracted from the master file of pension cases in March, 1977. Each record contains, in addition to statistical data such as age, number of dependents, and period of military service, detailed data on the amounts and sources of income received by the case.

To compute the cost of pension program alternatives, the model operates on each of the 20,000 records individually. A case is first aged and mortality assumptions are applied. The non-pension income reported by the case is then updated, using specific economic indicators for each source of income. If the case is a current pension recipient, the model determines which pension program would return the highest payment amount. The case is then assigned to the most advantageous program and recycled through the procedures until all five years of the simulation have been completed. Once the model "switches" a case from the existing pension to reform pension, the model assumes the case to be ineligible under the old program in future years.

When the entire data base has been analyzed to estimate how current beneficiaries would behave given the choice of new or old pension benefits, the process is reinitiated to select new cases. An estimated number of new cases that could be expected to accede to the current program is used to represent the number of potential applicants to the reformed system. This number of cases, once it has been reduced to correspond to the sample size, is randomly selected from the data base of current recipients. These "new" cases are then analyzed in the same manner as current beneficiaries, with the exception that they are assumed to be eligible for the reformed pension only. Counts are kept of the movement and disposition of cases at every stage of the model operation by period of service, type of beneficiary, and year. These counts are then inflated to the full population size to calculate the cost of the proposal.

Other factors:

It is not practical to show the cost of S. 2384 on a section-by-section basis, because a change in one section will affect the number of individuals who switch to the new program and, thereby, change the cost of other sections. A few sections which could not be handled by the microsimulation model, however, are discussed below.

Current-Work Income Disregard: Section 564(a)(8)(B) (chap. 15, title 38, U.S.C) is amended by this bill to provide an exclusion of $1,560 of earnings plus one-half the remaining earnings for veterans and surviving spouses who are in need of aid and attendance. The vast majority of those pensioners who are currently receiving aid and attendance allowances are quite elderly and, most likely, are not in a position to take advantage of this provision. Relatively young and catastrophically disabled veterans, however, could benefit substantially from this change. Under current law, earnings from any regular employment may well cause such veterans to exceed the income limits and terminate from the pension rolls, since the vast majority (over 90 percent) of them receive social security disability benefits. By losing their pensions, these veterans would also lose their eligibility for free VA health care, which, for catastrophically disabled veterans, can be of far more importance than their pensions. Under the new provisions a catastrophically disabled veteran alone, for instance, could earn as much as $12,000 a year (if he had no other income) and still be eligible for a small pension and VA medical care.

Since there are few catastrophically disabled veterans who are presently working in lieu of receiving pension, it is unlikely that this provision will add a significant number of cases to the pension rolls. For those cases now receiving pension, there should be some small savings as they gradually increase their earnings and attain self-sufficiency. The resulting savings would not be significant, however, as this population is quite small.

Payments to Institutionalized Pensioners: Section 206 of S. 2384 would increase from $50 to $60 the maximum pension payable to a veteran with no dependents who is being furnished hospital, nursing home, or domiciliary care by the VA. This section also provides that full pension benefits could be paid for as long as six months in the case of hospital and nursing home patients if it is shown that the extension of full benefits would facilitate the veteran's ability to return to the community. Based on information from VA that there were 7,430 such institutionalized pensioners in June 1977, the estimated cost of this provision is shown below:

[By fiscal years, in millions of dollars]

| | 1979 | 1980 | 1981 | 1982 | 1983 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Required budget authority | 1.0 | 1.1 | 1.2 | 1.3 | 1.4 |

Counting Children's Income: In keeping with the family-income concept on which the reformed pension is based, S. 2384 provides that all income of dependent children and children alone (those children not in the custody of an eligible surviving spouse) would be considered in determining their pension benefit level. Although no data are currently available on the incomes of pension children, as they are not required to submit an annual income questionnaire, it is expected that the vast majority of children alone and dependent children of widows receive social security benefits in amounts sufficient to render the cases ineligible under the reformed program. Those children cases presently receiving pension would, therefore, remain under the existing pension program and have no impact on the cost of the new program. There would, however, be substantially fewer new children cases under the reformed program than would be expected under the current program. The amount of the resulting savings cannot be determined with any precision given the data available.

DIC Parents Program: Title III of S. 2384 would establish a reformed program for parents receiving Dependency and Indemnity Compensation. Based on an April 1977 income distribution of these beneficiaries, the estimated cost of this provision would be as follows:

[By fiscal years, in millions of dollars]

| | 1979 | 1980 | 1981 | 1982 | 1983 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Outlays | 29.0 | 37.9 | 44.8 | 48.9 | 50.5 |
| Required budget authority | 31.5 | 38.8 | 45.9 | 50.1 | 51.7 |

Limiting Eligibility to the 50 States: This bill would limit the eligibility for reformed pension to individuals residing within the 50 States or the District of Columbia. The present pension program would remain open to current and future eligibles who permanently reside outside of the United States. According to Veterans' Administration figures, there were 158,275 veterans and survivors living outside of the United States in fiscal year 1977. Pension benefits of $87.7 million were paid to such individuals in the same year. As there would be no change in the law as it applies to these beneficiaries, this provision would have no budgetary impact.

"Grandparenting" Current Recipients: In addition, S. 2384 would allow individuals who are receiving benefits under the current program on the effective date of the bill to remain under the provisions of current law or to elect to receive the new program as they see fit. Election of the reformed program can be made at any time, but once made, the switch is irrevocable. A similar election provision was contained in Public Law 86–211, which established the present pension program in 1960. A study made by the VA in 1966, six years after the enactment of the program, found that there were still over 100,000 cases who were losing money through failure to elect the new program. Unfortunately, there is insufficient data to determine what percentage this represents of the total number of pensioners who were initially expected to benefit from switching to the new program. Based on what little information is available from this study, it can be expected that some number of persons will choose not to elect the reformed program even though it would provide them with higher benefits.

The experience of Public Law 86–211 will not correspond directly to what would be expected to occur following the passage of S. 2384, however. Under the provisions of the earlier law, there were several reasons for some pensioners to refuse election. In some cases a pensioner could have lost money in the long-run by switching to Public Law 86–211 pension, even through the benefits were higher at the time of election, because of changes in the sources of the veterans' income. For this reason the veteran's service organizations did not support Public Law 86–211 and did not encourage the pensioners in their membership to elect it.

Situations of this sort should not occur in the reformed pension program. If an individual is ever better off under reformed pension, that individual should always be better off under that program. Therefore, although the rate of switching to the reformed program will not be 100 percent of those who would benefit, it should be higher than the rate experienced after enactment of Public Law 86–211. This estimate assumes that every pensioner who would benefit by $1 or more from electing the reformed pension program will make the switch. Because past experience suggests that this may not happen for reasons which cannot be predicted, it is possible that the costs of S. 2384 could be lower than estimated for the first five years.

Budget Authority: Although this bill would result in additional future Federal liabilities through an extension of an existing entitlement, the bill would require subsequent appropriation action to provide the necessary budget authority. These figures shown in the cost estimate above as "Required Budget Authority" represent that amount of budget authority needed to cover the estimated outlays that would result from enactment of S. 2384.

The outlays shown in this estimate are lower than the budget authority, because pension benefits paid in any given month are the result of beneficiary entitlement in the prior month. The obligations created in each September, therefore, would not outlay until October, which would be in the next fiscal year.

VA costs assuming inflation in the current program: Although veterans benefits are not indexed for inflation, the non-service-connected pension program has received legislated cost-of-living increases every year except one since 1971. Given this precedent, it may be of value to examine the cost of S. 2384 over the cost of the current program with annual cost-of-living adjustments. These costs are shown below for informational purposes only. They do not reflect the budgetary impact of S. 2384.

8. Previous CBO estimate:

During the 95th Congress, CBO has provided the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee with cost estimates for a wide variety of pension reform proposals, including an estimate of S. 2384 as it was introduced. On May 15, 1978, a formal cost estimate of the bill as ordered reported was transmitted to the Committee. This estimate revises the May 15 estimate to reflect the impact of new economic assumptions.

CONCLUSION

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, this bill is the result of the dedicated labors of all the members of our committee and their staffs; and I particularly want to express my appreciation to the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD), our ranking minority member, for his help and guidance, and to the minority counsel, Garner Shriver, and assistant minority counsel, Gary Crawford, for their valuable contributions.

I also would like to thank for their deligent and productive work during the past year and a half in the development of this legislation, committee staff members Mary Sears, Ed Scott, Jon Steinberg, and Harold Carter, as well as Terri

Morgan, Ingrid Post, Ann Garman, and Janice Orr, and our GPO-detailed printers, Jim MacRae and Walter Klingner. They all worked incredibly long and hard to produce what I believe is a fine piece of legislation and a fine committee report.

I urge Senate approval of the pending increase as unanimously reported from the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

I yield to my good friend the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD).

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I thank my good friend, the distinguished Senator from California and the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, for yielding to me. I express my pleasure at serving with him on this committee which is devoted to the welfare of the American veterans and is strictly nonpartisan or bipartisan in character, and under Senator CRANSTON'S leadership it has been a great experience to serve with him on the committee and we have had splendid work from the staff on both sides of the aisle, on a bipartisan and nonpartisan basis, to achieve the ends which the committee has sought.

Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor and strongly support S. 2384, the Veterans and Survivors' Pension Improvement Act. The improved program of pension benefits is a result of several years study and effort on the part of many people to correct the inequities and deficiencies in the Veterans' Administration pension program. Personally, I consider S. 2384 as one of the most important veterans' bills to be considered by the Senate in recent years.

Much credit for bringing this improved veterans' pension program before the Senate should go to the chairman of our Veterans' Affairs Committee, the distinguished Senator from California, ALAN CRANSTON. He introduced this bill on December 15, 1977, with the cosponsorship of all the members of the committee and Senator WILLIAMS. I would also commend and express appreciation to the staff of the Veterans' Affairs Committee. Both the majority and minority staffs have worked diligently over a long period of time.

The reported bill corrects inequities in the existing pension law. It, also, will provide a standard of living for veterans who served during a wartime period that will result in better lives for them.

The bill before us would establish a new non-service-connected pension program for the veterans and survivors of the Mexican border period, World War I, World War II, the Korean conflict, and the Vietnam era. The new program would operate concurrently with the existing program. Those individuals who are receiving benefits under the existing program on the effective date of the bill would have the option of selecting whichever program offered them the higher benefit. Election of the reformed program would be irrevocable. All new cases would only be eligible for the reformed pension.

Since the Revolutionary War, the United States has paid some form of pension to needy veterans who served in wartime but were not disabled.

In 1778 the Continental Congress guaranteed half pay for 7 years after the war was over to officers who served for the duration. In 1780 the period was extended to half pay for life, regardless of whether the veteran was needy or not.

The forerunner of the present veterans' pension system was in the 1818 law that provided a pension to any veteran of the Revolutionary War who had served 9 months and who, "by reason of his reduced circumstances in life, shall be in need of assistance from his country for support."

The act of 1832, expanded that program to provide full pay for life to all veterans of the Revolutionary War who had served a total of at least 2 years and proportionate payments for life to those who served more than 6 months. There was no requirement of need or disability, but all those who were eligible were persons of advanced age. In 1836, benefits were extended to the widows of men who had been eligible under the 1832 act.

There followed pension legislation for veterans and their survivors of the War of 1812, the Mexican War and the Indian wars in much the same pattern as the Revolutionary War pension program. In 1890, pensions were provided for certain veterans of the Civil War. Sixteen years after the Spanish-American War and at other times following that war, veterans and their survivors were recipients of pension benefits.

At other times Congress has continued to enact and improve pension programs for our veterans and their survivors. I would direct attention to the Senate report of the Committee on Veterans Affairs accompanying S. 2384, for full and complete information concerning the bill before us at this time. It contains an excellent outline of the background for this legislation, and the many changes made from time to time in the veterans pension program.

In the 94th Congress, the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee formulated S. 2635, by then Chairman Hartke and sponsored by most members of the committee. The Veterans' Administration did not support the reform measure. It passed the Senate unanimously, but it was not acted upon by the House.

The bill before us would substantially increase maximum pension rates, assuring an annual income support level for all eligible veterans above the poverty level. The maximum benefit levels set by S. 2384 would be $3,240 annually for a veteran with no dependents and $4,284 for a veteran with one dependent. Two levels of benefits would be instituted for surviving spouses. A surviving spouse who is disabled or over the age of 64 would be paid at the same rate as a veteran. If the surviving spouse does not meet these requirements, she/he would be paid at rates that are two-thirds those for veterans ($2,172 annually for a surviving spouse with a child). The benefit level for all pensioners would be increased by $660 a year for each dependent after the first.

The Veterans' Administration conducted a comprehensive study of the veterans' existing pension program and in its report made this recommendation:

A new pension program should be developed.

The VA pension program should be a needs-based income maintenance program for the totally and permanently disabled and aged.

The program should treat similarly circumstanced persons similarly.

The same eligibility requirement should be applied to all applicants.

Equal benefits should be provided to those beneficiaries whose circumstances (income and assets) are the same.

Our committee is in agreement with the VA's recommendation. This bill is designed to meet these recommendations for an equitable need-based pension program.

The current pension program is a "two-variable" system with an annual income limitation and a sliding scale of rates. Under a one-variable system basic levels of income support are established by law, based on family size and other factors, and the amount of pension payable is determined by subtracting the annual countable income available to the veteran or survivor from the applicable income standard. The bill before us for consideration adopts the one-variable approach with income standards established for different categories of beneficiaries.

It is intended that the new pension system will allow veterans to live out their lives in dignity and prevent them from having to turn to welfare assistance. It will provide the greatest pension to those with greatest need with all eligible veterans assured of a level of assistance that places them above poverty and welfare levels.

This bill will provide additional assistance to our veterans over 80 years of age. It provides for a 25-percent increase in improved pension benefits to a veteran of a period of war if veterans of that period of war were not entitled to home loan guaranty benefits or GI educational benefits. In other words, the 25-percent add-on will benefit veterans of World War I.

Another important feature of this bill relates to a problem we have heard about every time Congress has authorized a veterans' cost-of-living increase.

Each year around the end of January we all receive letters and complaints about veterans' pension checks being reduced because of an increase in social security. This bill would do away with that problem for veterans and widows. The new program guarantees comparable increases each time there is a cost-of-living increase in social security benefits.

Under the current program, a pensioner who has social security income and gets a social security cost-of-living increase often actually receives a reduction in pension the following January—even though Congress enacts a cost-of-living increase in the pension rates and income limitations. Under the new program created in this bill, this would never happen because pension benefits will be increased automatically by the same percentage and at the same time as social security benefits.

Unrelated to pension, but considered by our committee as significant and important is the inclusion within S. 2384 of the naming of two Veteran's Administration hospitals. It provides that the VA hospital in Tampa, Fla., shall be named the "James S. Haley Veterans' Hospital"; and the VA hospital in Bedford, Mass., shall be named the "Edith Nourse Rogers Memorial Veterans' Hospital."

S. 2384 makes no changes in existing programs other than to provide that no person, other than a person who is residing outside the 50 States and the District of Columbia on the effective date of the new law, who applies for pension benefits on or after the effective date of the new law may receive benefits under any of those programs. With the exception of persons residing outside the United States on the effective date of the new program, any person receiving pension benefits under existing law may elect to receive benefits under the improved pension program; and that, if improved pension is paid at any time pursuant to such an election, the election would be irrevocable.

Based upon information furnished by the Congressional Budget Office, the 5-year cost resulting from the enactment of the committee bill would be $743.6 million in fiscal year 1979; $1,038.9 million in fiscal year 1980; $1,385.4 million in fiscal year 1981; $1.806.1 million in fiscal year 1982; and $2,271.6 million in fiscal year 1983.

The cost of the bill is within the committee's budget allocation.

Mr. President, this legislation represents a greatly improved veterans' pension program. The other body has passed a similar bill, and I hope that this bill may be passed in the Senate with no great difficulties, so that we can, indeed, reach agreement with the House of Representatives on any differences that may occur.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time and yield the floor.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Pension of the Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I rise to speak in favor of S. 2384, the Veterans' Survivors Pension Improvement Act. This bill, introduced by our distinguished chairman, Senator ALAN CRANSTON, provides for a new, improved security pension program. It is a result of 5 years of bipartisan hard work. I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this desperately needed legislation.

Mr. President, S. 2384 will provide needy wartime veterans, who are permanently and totally disabled as a result of a non-service-connected disability, with a new, improved security pension program. In addition, this legislation will establish a new program of security pension benefits to surviving spouses of wartime veterans and surviving children. So, Mr. President, a basic income standard will be provided for eligible needy wartime veterans, surviving spouses, and surviving children to be payable monthly.

This new pension program provides for annual automatic cost-of-living increases, based on the same percentage increase as that for social security, which will realistically become effective January 1, 1979. I am pleased, Mr. President, that by guaranteeing increases in pension benefits at the same time and at the same rate as social security increases, no veteran under the new program will have his pension benefits reduced because of social security benefit increases or other Federal retirement program increases. Also, under the new, more equitable pension program, veterans of World War I will receive a 25-percent increase in benefits if they were not made eligible for VA educational assistance or home loan benefits. These are two provisions affecting many deserving veterans that I am grateful to have included in this legislation.

Mr. President, I certainly hope this legislation will be approved by the Congress as soon as possible since it means a great deal to thousands of needy wartime veterans receiving non-service-connected pension benefits, surviving widows, and children. Like all Americans, veterans in Georgia and throughout the Nation are caught in the middle of rampant increases in the cost of living. The House has passed its version of the bill, and I am hopeful that the full Senate today will approve this bill so that an agreed upon measure, between the House and the Senate, will be sent to the President for his signature as soon as possible.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this measure which will provide relief and meaningful reform for the more than 1 million veterans and survivors currently receiving non-service-connected veterans' pension benefits.

For several years, problems in the area of veterans' pensions have been among the most troublesome in the field of veterans' affairs. Thousands of letters which I have received from South Carolinians continue to relate the same problem of veterans' pension benefits being cut back by cost-of-living increases in social security.

S. 2384 deals realistically and responsibly with the veterans' pension dilemma. The changes which it seeks to effect will, I hope, be the answer to many of the problems that have surfaced in this program in recent years. I am proud to have participated in the formulation of S. 2384 and wish to comment upon several of the provisions which I think are particularly meaningful to veterans and certain survivors now receiving veterans' pension.

First of all, although for purposes of computing pension entitlement S. 2384 contains few income exclusions, benefit levels for certain eligible veterans will be increased significantly under the act. For instance, an eligible veteran without dependents will be entitled to a maximum of $3,240 in pension benefits under the act's improved pension program, compared to $2,364 under current law. Naturally, a veteran's other countable income would reduce one's maximum entitlement under the new program. This procedure is the same as that provided for under current law.

Second, one provision of the bill which was introduced at the insistence of the minority members of the committee and unanimously supported by the full committee, will provide a 25-percent increase in improved pension benefits to veterans of World War I. The bill also provides a new program of pension benefits to certain needy surviving spouses of wartime veterans and equalizes these benefits, in certain instances, with rates now being paid to veterans. The act further provides a new program of dependency and indemnity compensation for eligible surviving parents who were being supported by a veteran who died of a service-connected disability.

Mr. President, one of the most significant provisions of S. 2384 is contained in title III of the act. This provision will require the Veterans' Administration to increase improved pension and the new DIC rates annually by the same percentage and at the same time as social security cost-of-living increases. This provision is intended to assure that no veteran or survivor will suffer a net reduction in VA pension and social security benefits as a result of a cost-of-living increase in social security. This provision, I hope, will eliminate altogether instances where a veteran and his family receive less social security and pension benefits after a social security cost-of-living increase than they did before the social security increase became effective.

Mr. President, I wish to commend the able chairman of the committee, Senator CRANSTON, for his diligence and industry in working out a pension reform measure acceptable to the entire committee. I also wish to commend the staff of the committee, particularly Mary Sears, for their long hours of labor on this proposal. Finally, I acknowledge the contributions of the American Legion, the VFW, the DAV, the AMVETS, the Veterans of World War I, and the Paralyzed Veterans Association without whose efforts our task of reforming this important veterans' program would have been impossible.

Mr. President, I fully support S. 2384 and urge my colleagues to do likewise.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1539

(Purpose: To relieve the States from certain contributing requirements)

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my colleague from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) I send an amendment to the desk, and ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), for himself and Mr. MOYNIHAN, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1539.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 77, line 5, strike " ".".

On page 77, between lines 5 and 6 insert the following:

SEC. 308. (a) Section 1682A(b) of title 38, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) amending clause (6) to read as follows:

"(6) such application was filed with the administrator within 180 days after the date on which the degree, diploma, or certificate described in clause (5) of this subsection has been awarded to such veteran; and";

(2) striking out the semicolon and the word "and" at the end of clause (7) and inserting in lieu thereof a period; and

(3) striking out all of clause (8).

(b) The first sentence of section 1682A(c) of such title is amended by striking out "and matching amounts paid to the Administrator by a State or local governmental unit, as described in subsection (b)(8) of this section,".

(c) Section 1682A(d) of such title is amended by—

(1) striking out "33⅓ per centum" in clause (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "66⅔ per centum";

(2) inserting "or" at the end of clause (2);

(3) striking out "33⅓ per centum" in clause (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "66⅔ per centum"; and

(4) striking out the comma after "$700" in clause (3) and all that follows down through the word "amount" in clause (4).

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to deal with the problem of a required State contribution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator withhold for a moment? Is this the Senator's amendment on which there is to be a one-hour limitation?

Mr. JAVITS. It is. I hope very much we will not take that long.

I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill, S. 2384. This amendment will remove the State matching requirement from the tuition acceleration provision of Public Law 95–202, the GI Bill Improvement Act of 1977.

This amendment and S. 2956 are based upon the tuition acceleration provision passed unanimously by the Senate last October 19, one which would have substantially assisted veterans to utilize their education benefits in educational institutions with high tuition charges. The GI Bill Improvement Act, Public Law 95–202, as initially passed by the Senate in S. 457, included a provision which would allow acceleration of a veteran's educational entitlement to pay 66⅔ percent of tuition costs above $700. Had the Senate position carried, veterans attending higher cost institutions would have been able to receive a greater amount of monthly GI bill educational assistance by utilizing more quickly portions of their 45 months total entitlement.

GI BILL STATE MATCH

However, the House added to the GI bill acceleration provisions a requirement that the States match the Federal contribution. The Federal share was thus reduced to a maximum of 33⅓ percent of a veteran's tuition costs above $700, to be paid only if the State in which the veteran's educational institution is located provides an equal match of State funds for the accelerated GI bill entitlement.

Mr. President, we perceive two basic problems with these acceleration provisions in Public Law 95–202, one philosophical and one pragmatic, which necessitate amendment of the GI Bill Improvement Act:

GI BILL NOT A STATE PROGRAM

First, the history of veterans benefits completely belies the concept of making GI bill assistance into a State matching program. Should veterans' benefits for serving our country depend upon home State ability or, more importantly, willingness, to pay for GI bill benefits? We believe not. It is extremely unwise for Congress to so restrict GI bill entitlements earned by those who have served in our Nations' Armed Forces.

Second, to couple a veteran's ability to accelerate his education entitlement to assist with high tuition costs—which was the Senate's intent in its passage of S. 457—with the requirement that States match Federal dollars, essentially results in little or no help to the veteran who wishes to accelerate. Few, if any, States can afford to meet current costs of higher education—much less provide additional appropriations to match Federal dollars for veterans' educational benefits. Since the State must match for the veteran to receive Federal assistance, the veteran who attends school in a State which cannot provide matching funds is left out in the cold.

Moreover, if a State chooses to match, but at a proportion less than the 33⅓ percent level, a veteran who accelerates will receive a much smaller entitlement than that intended by the Senate in its passage of its version of the GI bill amendments. In this sense, it is the State which determines whether or not the veteran who wishes to accelerate receives Federal GI bill education assistance to which he or she is entitled. According to the Veterans' Administration, not one State has yet put up even one dollar to implement this program.

Furthermore, Mr. President, incorporation in the GI bill of a State matching program entails unnecessary duplication, by States, of administrative functions currently carried out by the Veterans' Administration. Regulations proposed by the Veterans' Administration to conform to the new State matching program indicate that States must undertake additional administrative burdens, including State definition of "educational institution," to implement the matching program. The State matching program clearly results in additional administrative burdens on States while violating the historic intent of GI bill entitlements—to provide equitable benefits nationwide to those who have served in our Armed Forces. The GI bill has a national, not a State, purpose, and to chip away at such a national program in this manner is a grave mistake.

REMOVE THE STATE MATCH

The amendment which we offer today would simply remove the State matching requirement of the tuition acceleration provision in Public Law 95–202 and return the percentage of costs which may be reimbursed by the Federal Government through acceleration to 66⅔ percent of tuition above $700—to wit, a return to the Senate position in its unanimous passage of S. 457.

Mr. President, I am pleased that the Jewish War Veterans of the United States has endorsed this proposal.

We firmly believe that this amendment will permit the acceleration provisions to assist those Vietnam veterans who have earned, with their honorable service, GI benefits bestowed by a grateful nation, and I urge its acceptance by the Senate.

Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to relieve the States of the requirement that they must contribute to allow an individual veteran with a higher education entitlement to take advantage of the acceleration which that veteran is entitled to where tuition costs are above $700 a year.

The Senate has stated its position on this issue, which was taken on a previous measure but was amended by the House to provide the requirement from the State contribution. Had the Senate provision carried, veterans attending higher cost institutions would have been able to receive greater GI bill assistance by using more quickly portions of their 45 months total entitlement; but because the other body affixed a requirement for State matching, this provision has become largely inoperative, as the States have been unable or unwilling to do the matching.

Mr. President, this is not a matter of relieving the States, because the GI bill is not a State program, it is a Federal program. The House amendment which was included respecting State matching was simply brought in by the other body. It is rather unique in respect of assistance to veterans for higher education.

Therefore, Mr. President, I introduced a bill, S. 2956, some months ago, which had as its sponsors not only myself and Senator MOYNIHAN, but a broad bipartisan spectrum of Senators, including Senators BAYH, BROOKE, CLARK, NELSON, HUDDLESTON, HUMPHREY, RIBICOFF, RIEGLE, KENNEDY, CASE, WILLIAMS, MCINTYRE, and Senator DURKIN, who is also a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee.

Mr. President, to show how this works, my own State of New York is considered to contribute extremely generously to higher education for its veterans. The State provides $1.4 billion a year for this purpose. Yet not one dollar of that assistance can be used to meet the State's matching requirement under the GI Bill Improvement Act, since under the law the State must effect a cash transfer from the State to the Veterans' Administration educational loan fund—and that, as I say, even with a State that is as generous about State aid to education, including veterans, as my State has proved in the past—and hence the possibility of accelerating this program, which is so desirable for the GI's who enjoy it, has been made impossible.

According to the Veterans' Administration, the cost to the Federal Treasury of removing the State matching requirement would be as follows: For fiscal 1979, $3,600,000; for fiscal 1980, $12,600,000; for fiscal 1981, $33,300,000; for fiscal 1982, $30,900,000, and for fiscal 1983, $25,200,000, for a 5-year total of $106,500,000. But the effect would really be cumulative in terms of working with and assisting those veterans who have the will and the wish to improve their condition by getting the benefit of this acceleration provision, which has been, in effect, nullified by the State matching requirement to which I refer.

So, Mr. President, I hope very much that the managers of the bill may consider it appropriate to accept this amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield my colleague such time as he may require.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank my senior colleague.

Mr. President, I rise only to associate myself with everything the senior Senator from New York has said with respect to this matter, and I think I speak for other Senators as well. This is a matter, I believe, that will be acceptable to the managers of the legislation, and if that is the case, I wish to express my appreciation to them. This is by no means the end of our discussion of the extraordinary imbalance in the distribution of GI bill benefits in the aftermath of the last war. This is obviously something structural, and that will require a great deal of attention. But the matter has come to the Senate floor now, and the managers of the legislation have seemed receptive to the point we make. I would like to express my appreciation if that is the case, as I understand it to be.

I thank my colleague, and I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senators from New York for their comments. Let me say that I appreciate very much the deep personal commitment and concern that have prompted my distinguished colleagues from New York (Mr. JAVITS and Mr. MOYNIHAN) to make this proposal at this time.

However, Mr. President, in the form offered by Senator JAVITS, I cannot accept the amendment, because there are not sufficient funds in the first concurrent resolution on the budget to allow for the increased entitlement spending authority entailed by the amendment along with the entitlement costs of the legislation before us and the two bills, S. 2828, for service-connected compensation and survivors benefits, and H.R. 12028, for veterans housing benefits, which have been ordered favorably reported from the Veterans' Affairs Committee and which I am reporting today.

Mr. President, the Congressional Budget Office has estimated that the first-year cost of enactment of this amendment will be between $158 million and $230 million—depending on the startup time required. This amount would have be deducted from funds reserved in the first concurrent resolution for fiscal year 1979 which were intended to be used for increases and certain improvements in the service-connected compensation program.

As the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I cannot accept this result. Nor can America's veterans. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point a letter to me from the national commander of the Disabled Veterans specifically opposing this amendment, and a letter from the American Legion, opposing any amendment to the pending pension measure.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
July 27, 1978.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Chairman, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN CRANSTON: This letter is in reference to S. 2384, the Veterans and Survivors Pension Improvement Act of 1978, which, I understand, is scheduled for full Senate consideration on Monday, July 31, 1978.

It is also my understanding that when S. 2384 comes to the Senate floor, Senator Jacob Javits may seek to amend the bill with a proposal that relates to VA educational benefits administered under Chapter 34, Title 38, USC.

Specifically, the Javits Amendment would address the subject of the VA's new direct educational loan program (recently created by Public Law 95–202) proposing to change the "forgiveness of loan" provisions which apply to the program.

Under current law, the VA may waive repayment of up to one-third of the original loan made to the veteran provided that the government or appropriate municipality of the state in which the veteran is attending school reimburses the VA with a similar amount. Senator Javits' amendment would delete the state government reimbursement requirement and direct the VA to "unilaterally" waive repayment of up to two-thirds of the loan.

I wish to inform you that the Disabled American Veterans is strongly opposed to the Javits Amendment.

If it were to be enacted into law, it would increase VA expenditures in Fiscal Year 1979 by several hundred million dollars ($230 million is the CBO estimate). This money, not presently anticipated in any allocations made with respect to Fiscal Year 1979 VA expenditures, would have to be obtained from funds presently allocated to other VA programs. The most obvious and likely source would be funds now earmarked for much needed improvements in the VA's service-connected disability and death compensation programs, or in the VA's non-service-connected pension and death pension programs.

The DAV most certainly would object to "shortchanging" America's service-connected disabled veterans, their dependents and survivors in order to implement the provisions of the Javits Amendment.

In your capacity as Chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I urge that you oppose such an amendment, should it be offered during the Senate's consideration of S. 2384.

Sincerely,

OLIVER E. MEADOWS,
National Commander.

JULY 27, 1978.

DEAR SENATOR: The American Legion is anxiously awaiting Senate consideration of S. 2384 which is presently pending on the Senate calendar, and hopefully will be considered shortly. For the past several sessions of Congress, The American Legion has proposed and supported legislation to amend the veterans death and disability pension program so as to achieve the objective of (1) assuring an income standard above "poverty guidelines" so that eligible veterans and their survivors receive a pension commensurate with their need; (2) guaranteeing regular annual increases in pension benefits based on the increase in the consumer price index; and (3) guaranteeing that annual increases in pension benefits occur at the same rate and time as cost-of-living increases in social security benefit rates so that no veteran or survivor will suffer a reduction in pension solely due to cost-of-living increases in social security.

While we are not in full agreement with all of the provisions of S. 2384, the Veterans and Survivors Pension Improvement Act, we believe that it places the issue before the Senate and House for resolution between what the Legion is seeking and what the Congress believes is an equitable and reasonable income maintenance program for war veterans and their survivors.

As the legislative history of this and preceding Acts will reveal, your Veterans Affairs Committee has received and considered the views of many members of the Senate, organizations, and others before reporting S. 2384 for your consideration.

With regard to the present posture of the legislative calendar, and the requirements of the Congressional Budget process, we urge that when the measure is under consideration by the full Senate it will be passed without amendment.

The American Legion feels very strongly that the issue of improved pension should be considered on its singular merits and not be cluttered with other issues, which, due to cost or lack of sufficient study and consideration, would endanger its passage by the Congress and approval by the President.

Thank you for receiving the views of the American Legion.

Sincerely,

MYLIO S. KRAJA,
Director, National Legislative Commission.

Mr. CRANSTON. As Members will recall, last session, the GI Bill Improvement Act of 1977 as reported from committee made provision for a program to provide accelerated educational assistance allowances to certain veterans to cover 100 percent of tuition and fees above $1,000 for a school year satisfactorily completed by the veteran. During floor consideration of the measure, an amendment by Senators JAVITS and MOYNIHAN—which I cosponsored—was accepted to modify the program so as to provide accelerated entitlement to cover 66⅔ percent of tuition and fees in excess of $700.

However, Mr. President, Members will also recall that the House flatly refused to accept this provision as passed by the Senate. The compromise agreement that was subsequently reached on the legislation—and enacted as Public Law 95–202—provides for a joint Federal-State program whereby, for a veteran who satisfactorily completes his or her program of education at a school where the tuition and fees exceed $700 per year, as to direct loans made to the veteran by the VA, two-thirds of those loans in excess of $700 per year may be canceled—one-third through moneys paid by the State or local government and one-third by the VA on a matching basis.

Mr. President, with respect to the joint Federal-State program for accelerated entitlement enacted as part of Public Law 95–202 last year, the VA has embarked on a program to make State governments aware of and to encourage their participation in this system of accelerated payment of educational assistance allowances. The Administrator of the VA has sent individual letters to each Governor, as well as to the Mayor of the District of Columbia, outlining the basics of the accelerated program and encouraging them to participate in it.

Mr. President, the priorities for fiscal year 1979, I believe, must be to act on the legislation that I described previously.

However, I am sympathetic to the concerns of my distinguished colleagues from New York to deal with the problems of veterans in States where there are no low-tuition institutions of higher learning.

Hence, joined by Senator STAFFORD, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I am offering an amendment to the amendment proposed by Senator JAVITS and Senator MOYNIHAN. I send that amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not in order until all time has been yielded back on the Javits amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield back the remainder of my time.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1540 TO UP AMENDMENT NO. 1539

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the clerk will state the amendment to the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), for himself and Mr. STAFFORD, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1540 to the Javits unprinted amendment numbered 1539.

Mr. CRANSTON. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Add at the end of the amendment proposed by Mr. JAVITS (UP–1539) the following new subsection:

(d) The amendments made by this section shall not create spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93–344). The amendments made by this section shall not take effect until, and only to the extent that, funds for the purpose of carrying out such amendments are specifically earmarked for such purpose in an appropriations Act enacted in the 96th or a later Congress.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, there are two purposes to our amendment.

First, it would create no new entitlement spending authority, because it would be contingent upon appropriations being made available for the purposes of carrying out the amendment offered by Senator JAVITS. Consequently, it deals with the problem in the context of the congressional budget process that I outlined previously.

Second, by providing that such appropriations may not be made prior to the 96th Congress, it insures that the effort to obtain funds to carry out this amendment, if enacted, will not compete with efforts to appropriate the funds we will be seeking in the remainder of this Congress for improvements in and expansion of the Veterans' Administration health care system.

Mr. President, with this modification, the committee would be willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from New York. We have discussed this modification with the American Legion and the Disabled American Veterans who have written in opposition to floor amendments. Although they still would prefer that the Javits amendment not be offered at this time and on this legislation, they find it more acceptable with the proposed modification.

I hope the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) will be willing to accept the amendment Senator STAFFORD and I are proposing. I yield to Senator STAFFORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I join in hoping that the distinguished senior Senator from New York and his colleague will accept this amendment so that we can dispose of this matter. Otherwise, we have the difficulties the chairman of the committee has outlined, and the fact that both the DAV and the American Legion are opposed to amendments to this bill.

I might just say that the American Legion wrote all of us under date of July 27, and they said in view of the legislative calendar and the requirements of congressional budget process:

We urge that when the measure, S. 2384, is under consideration by the full Senate that it be passed without amendment.

It is out of consideration for the problem which Senator JAVITS and Senator MOYNIHAN brought to us last year and again this year that I join with the chairman of the committee in offering this amendment to the amendment of the distinguished Senator and hope we can resolve the matter now.

Mr. JAVITS. Will Senator CRANSTON yield?

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I have one question. As I understand the scheme of the amendment to the amendment, it would provide that next year, that is, when there is a new Congress, we would have to come both within the budget and the appropriation process, but that this would constitute the necessary authorization. Am I correct?

Mr. CRANSTON. The Senator is exactly correct, as he is almost always.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator is very kind.

I realize our situation. I feel very deeply about this amendment, as does my colleague and all of the cosponsors. I am moved by two reasons to go along with this amendment to the amendment. One, I believe it does represent a recognition of the justice of our position, and for that I am very grateful to the Senator from California and the Senator from Vermont. Second, we find a very wide disparity in the estimates between the Veterans' Administration and the Congressional Budget Office. This will give us an opportunity, authoritatively, to deal with that disparity. I am rather stunned by it. We have an estimate from the Veterans' Administration for $3.5 million, and an estimate from the Congressional Budget Office of well over $150 million. But that is life here in the Congress and we will resolve it. The Senator is offering us a way in which it can be resolved.

May I say one other thing? Not one single State has taken advantage of the State matching provision. So I think really while it is well intentioned it simply has not worked. The congressional intent with respect to acceleration of benefits by GI's has not been realized.

I hope there is enough justice in our cause so that we have a good chance to get relief next year with the authorization on the books.

Again I repeat, I thank both Senators very much for trying to facilitate what we have in mind with this amendment to the amendment. It is acceptable.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will Senator CRANSTON yield?

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield to my good friend from New York, who is also currently from California.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of my senior colleague, who has guided our purposes so carefully and well in this matter, and to thank the most distinguished chairman and ranking minority member of the committee who have proven friends to our purposes as they have proven friends to veterans throughout this Nation. It is a mark of equity, it is characteristically generous, and yet it is tough-minded, as we have to be in this matter. They are right and we accept their amendment with a sense of gratitude to them both.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator from New York very much for his generous remarks and his understanding.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the distinguished Senator will yield to me, Mr. President, I think we could ask that the Senate act on the Cranston-Stafford amendment to the Javits amendment and then stop there until Senator BELLMON gets here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do Senators yield back their time on the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. CRANSTON. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1540) to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I speak finally on the amendment, as amended, does Senator BELLMON wish to speak on the amendment or something else?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the distinguished Senator will again yield, it is the understanding of this Senator that Senator BELLMON does wish to speak on the Javits amendment.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CRANSTON. Will the Senator withhold that?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CRANSTON. I would like to say this as we wait for the Senator from Oklahoma: Before we accept the amendment offered by the Senators from New York, as modified by my amendment, I would like to explain the situation we will be confronting in dealing with the other body.

Mr. President, I believe that my record, the record of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, and the record of the Senate itself is clear: We have tried, and will continue to try, in a fair and equitable fashion, to help overcome the problems facing veterans in States where there are no low-tuition State-supported colleges.

Mr. President, I wish to say to my friends from New York that, if the Senate accepts this proposal, I will do my very best, as my colleague from New York who serves with me on the Human Resources Committee knows—since we have served together on many long and difficult conferences with the other body in the past—to represent the position of the Senate on this issue.

However, I wish to make very clear to the Members of this body and to the Senators from New York that I will not jeopardize the chances for success of the measure now before the Senate—S. 2384, the Veterans' and Survivors' Pension Improvement Act of 1978. This legislation—a much-needed, carefully designed, and equitable measure which will affect the lives of millions of our Nation's older and needy veterans and survivors—is and must be our No. 1 priority at this time. We have sought enactment of pension reform legislation for many years and now—when success is on the horizon—it would be unfair to jeopardize the chances for enactment of the underlying measure with nongermane provisions that have been unacceptable to the other body in the past.

Mr. President, I say again to the Senators from New York that I will carry the amendment into conference with the House where I will do my best—as is my obligation as a Senate conferee—to convince the House to accept it—just as we urged them to do last year. I can only promise that I will do my very best, but I wish to make it clear to the Senate and the public exactly what position the Senate will be in, and that, given the House's opposition in the past to this provision, I can guarantee no miracles.

I see that the Senator from Oklahoma is now present on the floor. If he could speak at this time, I think it would be appropriate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield time off the bill to the Senator from Oklahoma if he wishes time.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time be charged equally to both sides on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I think we are ready now to vote on the amendment of the Senators from New York, since the amendment that Senator Stafford and I offered to it removed the objections of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then, all time having been yielded back, is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment (UP amendment 1539) as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. JAVITS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am also pleased to note my firm support of S. 2384, essential legislation which provides for an improved pension program for disabled and older veterans in need of assistance and for the surviving families of wartime veterans.

Specifically, S. 2384 will provide for an adequate income standard so that eligible veterans and survivors receive assistance which meets their needs. This will insure that veterans and survivors in need of assistance will not have to turn to welfare. In addition, the bill will guarantee regular annual increases in pension benefits, and insure that these increases are commensurate and simultaneous with those in Federal social security and other retirement programs. Finally, the bill provides for a new program of dependency and indemnity compensation for needy surviving parents of veterans who died of disabilities connected with their military service. Through these amendments to the veterans' pension program, we can significantly improve our policy of meeting our special obligation to those who have contributed so greatly to the defense of our Nation.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be added as a cosponsor of the amendment of the Senators from New York, as amended.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I make the same unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Are there further amendments?

Mr. CRANSTON. I understand that Senator BELLMON has an amendment.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1541

(Purpose: To require a special report concerning veterans benefit programs)

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1541:

Mr. BELLMON. I ask unanimous consent that further reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 77, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

SEC. 308. The President shall prepare and submit to the Congress, not later than 180 days after the date of enactment of this act, a written report containing the following:

(1) A description of how the Veterans Administration and the Social Security Administration currently coordinate the delivery of Veterans' pension benefits, Social Security retirement and disability benefits, and Supplemental Security Income benefits to elderly and disabled persons.

(2) Recommendations for improving coordination among the programs referred to in paragraph (1), including legislation which would facilitate such improvement.

(3) An assessment of the feasibility of so-called "one-stop" service for persons eligible for benefits under the programs referred to in paragraph (1), including the advantages and disadvantages of unifying administration of intake, eligibility determination, check issuance, and other aspects of program administration.

(4) A description of inconsistencies, inequities, and/or undesirable features in the treatment of needy persons under the programs referred to in paragraph (1).

(5) An assessment of the feasibility and desirability of reconciling differences among the programs referred to in paragraph (1) in terms of features such as: benefit structure, income counted in determining eligibility and the amount of benefits, limitations on assets, accounting period for determining eligibility, and other program features.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield to me?

Mr. BELLMON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the IMF bill continue to be laid temporarily aside until no later than 2:45 p.m. today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I want to begin by commending the committee for the excellent work that has been done on this bill. I find a great deal in the bill that is an improvement on the present law, and I intend to vote for the bill's passage. I believe this bill will do much to provide for adequate support for many veterans and for their dependents.

There is one correction or one improvement that I believe could be made. That is what the amendment I have offered intends to do. The amendment would require a special one-time report from the President on ways of improving relationships between veterans' pensions and other income support programs.

Mr. President, many needy veterans receive support from supplemental security income as well as from social security. I believe that Congress needs a clearer view on how these programs presently fit together, and how we might fit them together better so that we can make needed improvements to help veterans in the future.

S. 2384 will affect significantly the mix of Federal benefits received by elderly and disabled veterans and their dependents and survivors. For instance, the bill provides that veterans' pensions will automatically be increased in the future in the same percentages as social security benefit increases. The bill also requires that all social security payments and other retirement benefits be deducted in determining veterans pension payments, and it changes the treatment of other types of income. The bill will increase the levels of pension benefits substantially and will thereby reduce the number of veterans and dependents receiving supplemental security income benefits.

Despite the improvements this bill will make in veterans' pension, I am concerned that none of us have a clear picture of inconsistencies, inequities, and administrative inefficiencies that may exist between income support benefits paid to veterans and their dependents by the Veterans' Administration and those paid by the Social Security Administration. I intend, therefore, to offer the attached amendment to S. 2384. This amendment will require a one-time report from the President by March 31, 1979 providing to Congress the following:

a. A description of how the Veterans Administration and the Social Security Administration currently coordinate the delivery of Social Security, and Supplemental Security Income and Veterans' Pension benefits to elderly and disabled persons and their dependents.

b. Ways in which coordination between these programs could be improved, including legislation which would facilitate such improvement.

c. Assessment of the feasibility of "one-stop" service for persons eligible for these programs including the advantages and disadvantages of unifying administration of intake, eligibility determination, check issuance, and other aspects of program administration.

d. Inconsistencies inequities, and/or undesirable features in the treatment of needy people stemming from differences in these programs.

e. Feasibility and desirability of reconciling differences between these programs in terms of features such as: benefit structure, income counted in determining benefits, limitations on assets, accounting period for determining eligibility, and other program features.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that a chart prepared by the Congressional Budget Office be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. This chart compares eligibility criteria and benefit levels under S. 2384 with current law and with the supplemental security income program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I believe that this amendment will help us to get a better view of what we are doing in connection with providing support for our veterans. I strongly urge the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the purposes of the amendment are quite laudable and, with minor changes, I think I could speak for Senator STAFFORD and myself in accepting it and suggest these modifications to the Senator from Oklahoma: On line 1, instead of having the President prepare and submit a written report, have the Director of the Office of Management and Budget prepare and submit the report.

On the second line, change "180 days" to "1 year". It will be a very complicated report. I think there should be more time.

Next, I should like to strike out the third clause which I really think is covered under the second recommendation for improving coordination.

The matter of "unifying administration" would create a great consternation, among veterans, service organizations, and others. The underlying intent could be covered by our noting that recommendations for improving coordination could obviously cover all such aspects.

If we strike clause (3), then clauses (4) and (5) should be redesignated as (3) and (4). In the first line of what would then be clause (4), which is the first line of the last paragraph, I should like to insert the word "unjustifiable" after the word "reconciling" and before the word "differences."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the distinguished Senator yield to me?

Mr. CRANSTON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I join with the distinguished Senator in offering those suggestions to the author of the amendment, the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma. I hope the distinguished Senator will accept them so that we can resolve this matter.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I find the suggestions of the floor manager and the minority member highly beneficial.

I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be modified accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to modify without unanimous consent, simply requesting that it will be so modified.

Mr. BELLMON. I send the modified language to the desk, Mr. President, and I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 77, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

SEC. 308. The Director, Office of Management and Budget shall prepare and submit to the Congress, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this Act, a written report containing the following:

(1) A description of how the Veterans' Administration and the Social Security Administration currently coordinate the delivery of Veterans' pension benefits, Social Security retirement and disability benefits, and Supplemental Security Income benefits to elderly and disabled persons.

(2) Recommendations for improving coordination among the programs referred to in paragraph (1), including legislation which would facilitate such improvement.

(3) A description of inconsistencies, inequities, and/or undesirable features in the treatment of needy persons under the programs referred to in paragraph (1).

(4) An assessment of the feasibility and desirability of reconciling unjustifiable differences among the programs referred to in paragraph (1) in terms of features such as: benefit structure, income counted in determining eligibility and the amount of benefits, limitations on assets, accounting period for determining eligibility, and other program features.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back on the amendment, as modified?

Mr. BELLMON. Yes.

Mr. CRANSTON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified.

The amendment, (UP. No. 1541) as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. CRANSTON. We are now ready to proceed to act on the committee amendment as amended.

● Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I am extremely pleased that we are today considering S. 2384, the Veterans' and Survivors' Pension Improvement Act. This measure is another important link in what has now become a 5-year effort on the part of the Senate to eliminate inequities and other deficiencies in the pension programs administered by the Veterans' Administration.

The desire to provide adequate pension benefits for the veterans most in need has always been one of the major objectives of our veterans programs. Indeed, nearly 25 years ago, President Eisenhower's Commission on Veterans Pensions, headed by Gen. Omar Bradley, recommended that the greatest assistance be provided to those veterans most in need. That philosophy was incorporated in the Veterans' Pension Act of 1959 for veterans with nonservice related disabilities but, because of subsequent adjustments in the benefit schedule through rate increases and increases in the annual income limitation, the program's objectives began to falter.

The 1975 "Study of the Needs of Older Veterans and Widows" prepared by the VA vividly showed the problems. According to that report, 30 percent of the veterans and nearly 37 percent of the widows interviewed reported that they were unable to buy all of the food they needed; 25.1 percent of the veterans and 20.9 percent of the widows were unable to pay for all of their medical care; and 36 percent of those interviewed expressed problems concerning housing.

The Veterans' and Survivors' Pension Improvement Act addresses precisely these problems. The bill is targeted to bring all veterans and veterans' widows with non-service-connected disability pensions above the poverty threshold established by the Labor Department. The bill assures that these individuals will be better prepared to pay for their food, medical care and housing.

For example, under S. 2384, benefits for a veteran without a dependent spouse or child would increase from the present level of $2,364 to $3,240 or slightly above the poverty threshold of $3,140 for such an individual. And, for a veteran with one dependent spouse, benefits would rise from the present level of $2,544 to $4,284.

Mr. President, in addition, to assuring that the greatest assistance which we provide for veterans' pensions programs is based upon need. S. 2384 accomplishes several other important goals. These include:

A guarantee that no individual in the pension program would suffer a reduction in his or her benefits because of a cost-of-living increase in benefits under social security or any other Federal retirement program;

An incentive for veterans receiving pension benefits to work on a part-time basis by allowing $780 of the earnings of all beneficiaries in the family to be excluded from countable income plus one-half of the remaining earnings, or $1,560 for a veteran and his surviving spouse;

An equitable restructuring of benefits for spouses to provide them with 100 percent of their deceased husband's benefits, instead of the present allowance of two-thirds of the original benefits payable to the veteran;

An automatic cost-of-living increase to eliminate the practice of separate legislation to be approved annually by the Congress;

A 25-percent increase in improved pension benefits payable to veterans of World War I who were unable to participate in VA educational assistance or home loan programs; and

An improved program of dependency and indemnity compensation (DIC) benefits for the needy surviving parents of veterans who died because of their service-connected disabilities.

Mr. President, in addition to these provisions, S. 2384 would name the Bedford VA hospital in my State of Massachusetts after the late Edith Nourse Rogers. I am particularly proud that the hospital is being named in her honor because she made so many valuable and lasting contributions to our veterans during her many years in the House of Representatives as a congresswoman and as the distinguished Chairperson of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee.

Mr. President, I am proud to be a cosponsor of this important bill and I urge my colleagues to support it.●

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise in support of S. 2384, the Veterans' and Survivors' Pension Improvement Act.

This measure is the culmination of a 5-year effort to address the inequities and other deficiencies in the Veterans' Administration pension program.

Mr. President, I am certain each and every one of my colleagues has often heard of the difficulties that exist with the veterans' pension program. Over the past 5 years one of the matters that I have heard about most frequently, in my contact with constituents in Kansas, and elsewhere, has been about the problems with the veterans' pension program.

PAST SUPPORT OF VETERANS' PENSION IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. President, during the 93d Congress, I introduced legislation, the Veterans' Pension Improvement Act of 1974, that would have made several improvements in the veterans' pension system. During the 94th Congress, I testified before the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee in support of veterans pension reform legislation, S. 2635. While this bill was unanimously passed by the Senate, the House did not act on it during the 94th Congress.

Mr. President, the long-time difficulties with the veterans pension program has prompted my support for improvements in the past. . . . Unfortunately, those difficulties continue to exist. Therefore, the Senator from Kansas is pleased to see that a measure of this type, which is long overdue, can be acted upon favorably by the Senate.

OFFSET SOCIAL SECURITY INCREASES

A very serious matter for veterans and their beneficiaries has been the decline in veterans' pension when social security payments increase. Veterans who serve their country loyally and faithfully feel that they have rightfully earned their pensions. After all these years when veterans are beginning to enjoy the pensions provided by the Government, it is especially disturbing to them to see their pensions reduced when social security is increased. As indicated in the many letters I have received, a great number of older veterans have grown dependent on their pension incomes. The loss or reduction of their pension due to social security increases can be especially painful.

The bill I introduced during the 93d Congress contained a provision to resolve this problem. Likewise, the bill before the 94th Congress also contained a provision to avoid pension reductions due to social security increases. As in past bills, S. 2384 guarantees that annual increases in improved pension benefits occur at the same rate and at the same time as cost-of-living increases in social security benefit rates—so that no person in the improved pension program will suffer a reduction in pension solely attributable to a cost-of-living increase in benefits under social security or any other Federal retirement program.

In my opinion, this provision is especially important for our senior veterans.

IMPACT OF INFLATION

Veterans receiving pensions have clearly been among those most adversely affected by inflation in recent years. Most of those receiving veterans pensions are senior citizens on fixed incomes who cannot go elsewhere to obtain additional income in order to offset rising expenses for food, clothing, housing, and other necessities.

The committee bill, as I understand it, includes provisions, known as "indexing provision," under which annual automatic cost-of-living increases are made in benefit levels in order to prevent the value of benefits from being eroded by inflation. Similarly, my bill also included an automatic cost-of-living escalator so as to increase pensions and income limitations in a manner to offset increases in living increases.

In the past, cost-of-living increases in veterans pensions have required action by the entire Congress. Inclusion of the automatic cost-of-living escalator will avoid any delay in providing the appropriate increase in pensions that might result due to a crowded legislative schedule in the Congress. This provision will allow veterans to receive a cost-of-living increase annually and not be faced with any delay.

EQUALITY FOR WIDOWS

Mr. President, I would also like to express my support for the provision in this bill to provide the same level of pension payments for widows and single veterans. This provision was also included in the bill I introduced in the 93d Congress.

As we all know, pension payments have traditionally been made on the basis of need. However, the simple fact is that it costs as much for a widow to live as it does for a single veteran. In other words, a widow's need for a pension is just as great as that of a single veteran. Yet, the present system provides for a widow's pension of less than two-thirds of that provided a single veteran.

It is also true that in most cases, a veteran's widow shared the economic and financial hardship that the veteran himself experienced. On this basis, pension equality is justified. Pension might be viewed as a reward to a veteran for the economic or financial loss due to the time away from his given profession during the time of his service. In this respect, the veteran would have suffered the same degree of hardship. While widows of veterans may not have experienced the same degree of personal risk from combat as their veteran husbands, certainly many of them experienced the anguish of having their husbands serving in hazardous duty and faced the risk of their spouse becoming a combat casualty.

Mr. President, the discrimination against widows has gone on long enough, and I hope we can end this discrimination as this legislation would provide.

Mr. President, I would like to commend the distinguished members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs for their dedication and hard work in bringing this bill to the floor.

This bill contains a number of meritorious provisions for our veterans and eligible dependents drawing pension benefits and I urge my colleagues to unanimously adopt it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of H.R. 10173, the House-passed measure, and that the bill be deemed to have been read twice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 10173) an act to amend title 38 of the United States Code to improve the pension program for veterans, and so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed immediately to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I move that H.R. 10173 be amended by striking all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the text of S. 2384, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I will ask for the yeas and nays in one moment, if we have enough Senators.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, pending the arrival of Senators, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that the time be charged equally between the majority and minority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on final passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second. There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the rollcall occur on final passage at 3 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I yield back all time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield back all time for the minority.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

The Senate continued with the consideration of S. 2152.

AMENDMENT NO. 3390

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, today I offer an amendment with my colleague from South Dakota which will help insure two fundamental goals of our foreign policy. First, it will bring stronger congressional control over our foreign assistance programs in a time when some would have us totally abandon our constitutional authority over dispersal of tax moneys. Second, this amendment will guarantee that the two historic and fundamental foreign policy goals of this Nation—the support of human rights and replenishment of human needs—are strengthened in an age when human rights are under attack and world poverty engulfs ever-larger numbers of the world's poor.

Before detailing the benefits of this amendment and answering the charges of its critics, let me first say that I am appalled at the efforts by the administration to kill this amendment. These efforts reflect a kind of moral atrophy within the executive branch—a stubborn unwillingness to apply even modest efforts to reorient the international institutions which are fast becoming the driving forces behind the effort to defuse the globe's most serious and entrenched problems.

Nor is this effort the first by this administration in trying to frustrate any effort by this Congress in insuring that U.S. tax moneys do not disappear into the amoral labryinth of the growingly distant complex of international financial structures. Without a single exception, to my knowledge, the administration has opposed human rights amendments by Congress on all foreign aid legislation for the last 2 years. It opposed such language on the World Bank. Congress passed it. It opposed such language with the Asian Development Bank and the African Development Fund. Congress passed it. The administration has opposed efforts to cut back on U.S. military assistance to countries clearly using such aid to strengthen their regimes and smash the expression of all dissent, freedoms and fundamental human rights. Congress passed them. And again we find the administration maneuvering behind the scenes to oppose the amendment we propose today.

And yet we were assured by President Carter recently that—

> My government will not be deterred from our open and enthusiastic policy of promoting human rights . . . in whatever ways we can.

The President is correct. Openly, this administration is enthusiastic about human rights.

Privately, it has attempted to kill virtually every concrete congressional effort aimed at bettering the conditions of the poor throughout the world subjected to the tyrannies of immense poverty and brutal oppression. After 2 years, these actions by the administration have become more than an irony, they have become calculated policy.

Mr. President, the first positive effect of the Abourezk amendment will be to continue a modest congressional influence over the policies of international financial institutions to which this Nation is a major contributor. Toward this end, the amendment seeks to insure that human rights and human needs are at least a consideration during Executive Board deliberations on all IMF loans. The amendment is a legitimate and necessary exercise in congressional authority.

In recent years we have seen a dramatic shift in congressional, and thus U.S. taxpayer control, over foreign aid programs. In fiscal year 1976, the Congress authorized only 31 percent of total U.S.-related assistance to the developing nations of the Third World. This amounted to only $8 billion of the total $25 billion in foreign aid moneys and included expenditures for such direct programs as those administered by AID and Public Law 480. By contrast U.S. contributions to international financial institutions such as the IMF and the World Bank have more than doubled their spending since 1971.

Let me make one thing absolutely clear. I am not an opponent of U.S. involvement and cooperation in these institutions. Indeed, I have supported substantial appropriations for these institutions when their authorized levels have come before the Appropriations Committee, Subcommittee on Foreign Operations, for review. I would challenge anyone to surpass my support in this area.

Let me make another point. Many would prefer that more specific and exacting language be applied as a precondition to the authorization and appropriation of the $1.7 billion U.S. share to the Witteveen Facility. The Abourezk-Hatfield language makes no such precondition—it does not "politicize" the IMF. I have opposed consistently any and all efforts to attach preconditions to the U.S. contributions to international financial institutions because these preconditions clearly make acceptance of the U.S. contribution by the banks impossible.

It is as clear that with human rights language added, such institutions as the World Bank were not only able to accept U.S. funds, but were able and willing to allow the U.S. representative to vote against loans to nations in consistent violations of human rights if that same loan was not directed toward meeting the needs of the poor.

Under our amendment, the same fundamental direction to the U.S. Executive Director of the IMF applies: Explore ways of insuring that both human rights and human needs are a consideration during IMF loan discussions and report to the Congress progress in helping to implement this policy. This does not "politicize" the Fund beyond the stated intention of article I:

> To contribute to the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment and real income and to the development of the productive resources of all members as primary objectives of economic policy.

It most certainly does not politicize the Fund beyond the rather impressive extent recently reported in the Washington Post wherein:

> An official of the International Monetary Fund would take a key role in managing Zaire's central bank.

If this does not constitute a direct, internal involvement with the political affairs of a sovereign nation, I am at a loss to explain the meaning of the term "political."

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, June 14, 1978]

ZAIRE ACCEDES KEY ECONOMIC ROLE TO FOREIGNERS

(By Michael Getler)

BRUSSELS.—Zaire's virtually bankrupt government yesterday offered to accept broad foreign control of its economy in an effort to solve crippling financial problems aggravated by the invasion of Shaba Province.

Under the African nation's proposals, according to conference participants, an official from the International Monetary Fund would take a key role in managing Zaire's central bank and another foreign official would supervise all outlays by the Finance Ministry.

The plan was presented at the start of a two-day meeting between Zairian officials and representatives of 10 creditor nations and three international bodies. Together, they exercise a crucial influence on the survival of President Mobutu Sese Seko's government.

While the meeting was scheduled before the invasion by Katangan rebels a month ago, the overriding issue was whether Mobutu's government, and Western investments in the huge country, can be protected time and again from determined attackers—who President Carter has maintained are Cuban-trained.

The creditor nations show little sympathy for Mobutu yet seem to be forced to save him to keep Zaire in the Western camp and capable of paying its debts.

This mood of political frustration lends an air of unreality to the meetings, which is supposed to concentrate solely on financial issues affecting the potentially rich mineral-exporting nation.

Lack of discipline in Zaire's central bank and inefficiency and corruption within the government have been major factors for the past few years in Western reluctance to extend still more credit and aid to a country whose debt is already said to total about $2.5 billion.

The so-called "Mobutu Plan," and Zaire's economic woes, both go back some two years and are due in part to the sharp decline in world copper prices. Copper provides about 70 percent of Zaire's export revenues, with cobalt the second major mineral export.

The situation neared the brink of economic catastrophe following the invasion of mineral-rich Shaba Province by rebels based in Angola. The attack, although eventually driven off by French paratroopers, has shut down the mines for at least six months and driven away or left dead many of the Europeans who operate the mines.

The meeting here is not designed to make decisions on what to do about the economic plight but rather to hear the revised Zaire plan and achieve some sort of consensus about what can be recommended to the governments of the United States, Britain, Belgium, France, West Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, Japan, Canada and Iran, as well as IMF World Bank, and the executive committee of the European Common Market.

The officials meeting here are trying to agree on recommendations for an initial $1100 million to $120 million emergency aid program of food, medicine and humanitarian supplies over the next three months that was agreed in principle at a five-power meeting in Paris earlier this month.

The Mobutu plan, however, could eventually cost a few billion dollars.

Although the plan was not made public, Belgian officials said their former colony indicated its long-term investment needs through 1980 amount to about $1 billion. Whether this would come from governmental or private sectors is now being discussed.

Zaire, according to Belgian officials, already has unmet debt repayments projected at $2.2 billion between 1977 and 1980. Some 40 percent of this is owed to private creditors.

In addition to the investment program, additional aid would be needed from international organizations.

The key factor in whether the plan gains widespread support, however, is said to hinge upon the IMF granting new credits to Zaire. In 1976–77 the IMF granted special standby credits totaling some $273 million.

The Mobutu plan is said to propose major efforts to get the shattered mining industry back into production, attract foreign investors, revamp the public service, improve customs and import licensing services and democratize the country.

Zaire has always had many Europeans in key advisory posts—especially Belgians, who have some $6 billion invested there. But the new plan envisions bringing in many others.

The arrival of these foreign experts, Zairian delegate Bokana W'Ondangela said, "doesn't mean we are coming back to colonialism—but simply into international cooperation. We are turning to our friends and to international organizations for assistance."

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, in July 27, Secretary Blumenthal sent me a letter which I presume he also sent to my colleagues. In that letter, specifically in the section entitled "Should Human Rights/Human Needs Considerations be Applied to the IMF and the Witteveen Facility" the Secretary specifies the adminitsration's latest objections to the amendment we debate today.

Secretary Blumenthal writes in opposition to our language:

The IMF's Articles of Agreement require that decisions on its operations be made only on the basis of economic criteria and that it not involve itself in the political and social policies of members.

Excluding for a moment the IMF personnel involvement in Zaire, I will remind the Secretary that article 1 of the IMF calls for "* * * the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment * * " and " * * the development of the productive resources of all members as primary objectives of economic policy." Indeed, the language we offer today proposes modestly that during the economic considerations of the Fund they, the Board consider economic policies which, to the greatest extent feasible, will not have a prejudicial impact on the poorest of the poor. Indeed, the amendment specifies—even requires—that the U.S. Executive Director seek to apply human rights/human needs criteria to individual loan transactions, within its own discretion.

The intent is clearly and simply to see that when a wide variety of economic factors are considered by the IMF as remedy for the deficit of a borrowing country, that the factors impacting heaviest on the poorest of the poor in the nation be subject to the close scrutiny before they are approved. I hasten to add that this does not prohibit tough economic measures being accepted by the IMF. The amendment does seek to influence such that economic alternatives which hold less harsh implications for the poor, but yet which help toward balancing financial deficits, be given priority consideration. Such alternatives, among many, include reduction in military expenditures and increased temporary taxes on luxury items, for example. Please let me emphasize here, Mr. President, that the amendment in no way requires these specific alternatives or in any way attempts to shackle the freedom with which the U.S. Executive Director could seek still additional alternatives. The language of the amendments suggests policy guidelines—it in no way mandates specific actions.

The amendment refers entirely to the terms under which such loans to borrowing countries are offered. It does not demand that the borrowing country have a faultless human rights record. It refers entirely to the terms under which such loans are offered, an area in which the Fund regularly exercises considerable flexibility. The charter rights of member nations are fully protected since the evaluation is confined to the terms of the stabilization programs recommended and approved by the IMF itself. Moreover, the amendment gives the U.S. representative broad authority to evaluate the rights impacts of proposed transactions and to choose the most effective means of expressing congressional concerns.

IMF members now do not enjoy an unqualified right to borrow from the Fund. The only Fund loans that are granted without conditions are those which correspond to that portion of the member's quota originally paid in gold (or SDR's). Every loan above that, so-called, gold tranche is subject to terms approved by the Fund's executive board.

The proposed amendment would not change this practice. Every member would have a right to a Fund loan if it agreed to meet Fund terms—terms which would continue to refer exclusively to economic considerations. The sole difference is that, in fashioning its own recommendations, the Fund staff would be expected to be attentive to the human rights needs implications of the proposed terms, with the U.S. Executive Director reserving the right to oppose transactions whose economic terms he regards as insensitive to those needs. If such a transaction is rejected by the executive board the potential borrower is entirely free to propose new terms and programs for accomplishing them.

This directly contradicts the Secretary's claim that "application of human rights considerations to IMF transactions would represent an effort to deny a country rights in the IMF to which it is legally entitled * * *"

The Secretary's letter raises another important issue when he writes:

Any attempt to introduce non-economic factors into IMF decisions would seriously undermine the effectiveness of the institution. It would also invite other countries to make political objections to IMF transactions with countries we are interested in helping.

The view that this amendment would introduce political considerations into IMF deliberations in some new way is quite incorrect. In every conventional sense, the IMF is already a political institution, aided by a Board of Governors which reflect and represents the diverse interests of the member nations. The whole purpose of this representative authority—as distinguished, say, from a panel of experts—is to permit member governments to exercise their national interests in the formulation of Fund policies and programs. The Fund is only "nonpolitical" to the extent that decisions concerning the rights and obligations of members are made on the basis of strictly economic criteria. This amendment changes nothing in that traditional practice.

Mr. President, the administration's oft-stated view that the IMF Board operates in some type of a nonpolitical, macroeconomic vacuum approaches practical absurdity.

So too does the administration's claim that a U.S. initiative of this sort could prompt other nations to attach conditions to their own contributions. While we have repeatedly pointed out that we are setting no conditions on the U.S. contribution, it is important to note that such conditions have already been assumed by other major contributors.

Finally, I simply want to make part of the record the immense political and economic implications that IMF policies can have on countries which must meet stricter financia] policies to qualify for IMF loans. I submit for the RECORD news accounts of the negative effects of IMF policies on the very long-term political and economic stability among recipient nations which the administration valiantly assures us the IMF is trying to assure. I ask unanimous consent that these articles be submitted to the RECORD. I would like to read a short excerpt from the New York Times involving the cases of Peru:

The announcement last week of austerity measures required by the IMF stabilization * * * touched off the turmoil (of rioting, strikes, and bloodshed). That, in turn, forced the military government to declare martial law, suspend constitutional guarantees of assembly and free speech, and postpone the Peruvian elections, the first in 15 years.

Mr. President, in conclusion I again emphasize that this amendment offers my colleagues an opportunity to exert some congressional influence over the $1.7 billion we are appropriating. It also reinforces the commitment of this Congress to the goals that have always been paramount within U.S. foreign policy: the protection of human rights and the furtherance of human needs.

It is a modest amendment. It accomplishes precisely none of the onerous liabilities attributed it by the administration. Its language is neither unnecessarily restrictive nor does it take a sledehammer to the structure of the IMF. It is a simple, carefully balanced effort to help the world's poor, and to bring their needs, whenever possible, to the forefront during the far-reaching decision made by the IMF. I ask my colleagues to both understand the limits of our goals, and support this effort to help—however modestly—the dispossessed of the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I have carefully read the Abourezk-Hatfield amendment and understand the very laudable goals that the authors have in mind. They are concerned, as I think all members of both the Foreign Relations Committee and the Banking Committee are, with the furtherance of human rights. They are concerned, as I think we all are, with trying to help people and help society eliminate poverty and disease. They are concerned with trying to assure that there is enough food, enough clothing, enough shelter, enough jobs, enough health care so that all the people of the world may live with a certain amount of basic human decency, and that as a result we might have a more stable and, therefore, more peaceful world. Those are all very good and useful goals. They are goals, however, I suggest that are not best pursued through this legislation.

Mr. President, first let me say that the IMF is not a foreign aid program. We have had amendments like this in the past to foreign aid authorizations and to military assistance authorizations. I have supported some, perhaps all, of those amendments that are responsibly designed to improve human rights and to help other nations achieve more in the human needs area.

However, it is important to note that the IMF is not an aid program. It is the institutional centerpiece of our international monetary system. It serves as a common storehouse of international monetary reserves upon which Members may draw for their economies to help eliminate their balance-of-payments problems.

Its decisions are made only on the basis of economic criteria and, like other international financial institutions, its membership involves not only rights but also obligations that are critical to the functioning of the Fund and to the international monetary system.

Members have avoided introducing noneconomic factors into IMF operations, and the Fund has remained remarkably free of political conflicts.

The members of the IMF, Mr. President, include Communist and non-Communist countries; they include Israel and the Arab States; they include Greece and Turkey, and a variety of other nations with often conflicting ideologies and economic systems.

Introducing human rights and human needs considerations, laudable as those are goals in themselves, into IMF decisions would invite other nations to raise their own political objections to IMF transactions. As a result, we could see this amendment become an example to other countries, and soon we would find the use of similar criteria involving the nonalined countries versus the alined, the Communist versus the non-Communist, the Arab countries versus the Israelis, and so forth.

We do not want any action we take here today to be seen as an attempt to deny a member in good standing in the IMF of its rights in the IMF. Nothing could do more to undermine this institution, which tries to make sure that our monetary system is internationally sound. We do not want to undermine any member's willingness to meet its obligations in the IMF, and we do not want to undermine the IMF's ability to foster a sound international monetary system.

I understand some of the arguments that the proponents of this amendment have made. They have argued that in the past IMF stabilization programs have often been implemented in such a way that the economic hardships they entailed were concentrated among the poor, and they have cited instances where social programs, such as subsidies, are often the first to be eliminated or reduced.

The proponents of the amendment state that this amendment would simply inject badly needed concerns for equity into the formulation of stabilization programs. Although I have not seen the articles that were submitted by the Senator from Oregon a few minutes ago, my understanding is that this is what they deal with.

I would like to respond to that argument because, in fact, IMF stabilization programs deal with broad macroeconomic trends in each country, not with specific industries, not with particular sectors of the economy, and not with particular income groups.

Specific choices in these areas are not the prerogative of the Fund but of the borrower. The Fund does not attempt to make detailed allocative decisions about a member's economy, and it purposely avoids making judgment on the social and economic priorities of the borrower. Indeed, economic stabilization programs are essential to the long-term economic growth and development which will provide a better climate for the observance of basic human rights and needs. The stabilization programs are, in essence, austerity programs which could well, in the short run, reduce the overall living standard.

The Witteveen facility though, will permit countries to establish longer term stabilization programs than normal with less rigid limits on domestic benefits, Government borrowings, public consumption, and so forth, and thus lessen the impact of such a program on a country's standard of living.

The Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER) and I had a discussion on this point on Friday where he was concerned that some of the steps required by virtue of an agreement between the IMF and Zambia had forced the sale of copper at extremely low prices; to which I responded that indeed the Government of Zambia might have made a decision to sell copper at a lower price, but had the IMF not been able to step in and stabilize the foreign currency situation in that country, virtual bankruptcy might have resulted, with a consequent worsening of the dumping of copper on the open market.

I think the Senator from Montana was at least partially persuaded by that argument because clearly when you have a desperate situation even more desperate measures are taken. This, I say to my colleagues, Mr. President, is what I think we should remember.

I would hope, too, that the authors of this amendment would remember that the IMF does not, unlike the development banks, finance specific projects or deal with the microeconomic issues I mentioned a moment ago. We are talking about general balance of payments financing based solely on economic criteria, and those criteria are designed to bring that necessary economic stabilization to the borrower by influencing broader macroeconomic trends.

In particular, it is left up to the country with which the IMF has an agreement to decide what choices it is going to make to further the improvement in its economy. Nothing could be further from the truth than to suggest that the IMF in any way takes a role in suggesting that the poor, the hungry, the homeless, or the needy should bear the brunt of any of the stabilization programs.

Mr. President, I would hope, therefore, that we remember, as I said at the outset, that the IMF is not a foreign aid program but a world monetary institution. It is an institution in which members have mutual rights and obligations, and upon which the United States has drawn 23 times in the amount of $3.5 billion for balance-of-payments needs.

It would be a very grave error to begin, as I believe this amendment does, to start, the process of the politicization of this institution which, I believe, has served the international community and this country well.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MELCHER). The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VETERANS' AND SURVIVORS PENSION IMPROVEMENTS ACT

WAIVER OF PARAGRAPH 3 OF RULE XII

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, was paragraph 3 of rule XII waived on getting the final vote on S. 2384, the veterans' pension bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the rule was not waived.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that paragraph be waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of that bill, because we shall be voting on it in 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, in the United States today there are 29.8 million men and women who are veterans of service in our Armed Forces; 26.2 million of these are veterans of wartime service. Since 1969, the welfare of these men and women has been a major concern and interest of the distinguished senior Senator from California, Mr. CRANSTON. Soon after his election to the Senate in 1968, Mr. CRANSTON became chairman of the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee. He now serves as chairman of the full Committee on Veterans' Affairs, which performs, in a unified fashion, and legislative and oversight functions previously divided between three subcommittees of standing Senate committees.

Senator CRANSTON has been an eloquent spokesman for those who sacrificed and endured hardship in the service of our country. He has been a diligent and effective legislator whose work has resulted in significant improvements in veterans' programs. Soon after his arrival in the Senate, he conducted an important series of hearings and investigations into the quality of medical care being provided to veterans of the Vietnam war. Although our country has had a longstanding commitment "to care for him who shall have borne the battle," these investigations revealed that our commitment to veterans of this era was not being fulfilled. As a direct result, major changes in veterans health and medical care programs were instituted.

Today the Senate considers another bill introduced by Senator CRANSTON: The Veterans' and Survivors' Pension Improvements Act. Early in December, Senator CRANSTON introduced, on his own behalf and that of the full membership of the Veterans Affairs Committee, a comprehensive bill to reform the Nation's pension program for needy wartime veterans and their survivors. At that time, significant attention and study had already been focused on inequities in the veterans' pension program. When introducing the measure, Senator CRANSTON noted that—

At present, hundreds of thousands of needy, elderly veterans and their survivors are cruelly and unfairly deprived of the full benefit of social security cost-of-living increases because the increases mean a reduction in a veterans' pension.

The measure before the Senate today, S. 2384, will go a long way toward erasing this and other inequities. Its provisions should assure that VA pensioners who are most in need will receive the greatest increase in benefits. The bill includes several inovations designed to guarantee that our veterans can live in dignity, and with some degree of financial security: A cost-of-living adjustment factor incorporated in the new pension program; a partial exclusion of work income which will do away with the existing disincentive to work. And this is a money saving, not an inflationary measure. Cost savings are expected to result from these reforms because benefits are targeted to the needy.

The bill will, I believe, help to achieve the goal stated at its introduction—to establish a minimum income standard "in order to permit veterans and their survivors to live in dignity." Our country can do no less, for we have promised not only to care "for him who shall have borne the battle" but also "to care for * * * his widow and his orphan."

I commend the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, and all its membership, for reminding us of our historic commitment, and for devoting their time and energy to the study of our complex and often archaic veterans' programs. Their work has produced a measure which gives substance to our promises.

In particular, this is an appropriate moment for me to thank the distinguished chairman, Mr. CRANSTON and the ranking minority member, Mr. STAFFORD, for their continued leadership in this area.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will proceed to vote on H.R. 10173, as amended. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), and the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS) is absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), and the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON) would each vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN), and the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 85, nays 0, as follows:

So the bill (H.R. 10173), as amended, was passed, as follows:

TITLE I—IMPROVED PENSION FOR VETERANS AND SURVIVORS

SEC. 101. (a) Chapter 15 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) redesignating subchapter IV as subchapter V and by renumbering sections 560, 561, and 562 as sections 571, 572, and 573, respectively; and

(2) inserting after subchapter III the following new subchapter IV:

"Subchapter IV—Improved Pension for Non-Service-Connected Disability or Death

"§ 561. Improved pension for veterans of a period of war

"(a) The Administration shall pay improved pension at the rate prescribed by this section to each veteran of a period of war who meets the service requirements of this section (as prescribed in subsection (h) of this section) and who is permanently and totally disabled from non-service-connected disability not the result of the veteran's willful misconduct.

"(b) If the veteran is unmarried (or married but not living with or not reasonably contributing to the support of such veteran's spouse) and has no child to whose support the veteran is reasonably contributing, improved pension shall be paid to the veteran monthly at the annual rate of $3,240, unless the veteran is entitled to improved pension at the rate provided by paragraph (1) of subsection (d) of this section or by subsection (e) of this section, reduced by the amount of the veteran's annual income.

"(c) If the veteran is married and living with or reasonably contributing to the support of such veteran's spouse or has a child to whose support the veteran is reasonably contributing, improved pension shall be paid to the veteran monthly at the annual rate of $4,284, unless the veteran is entitled to improved pension at the rate provided by paragraph (2) of subsection (d) or by subsection (e) of this section. If a veteran who is entitled to improved pension at the rate provided for under this subsection has two or more such family members, the annual rate shall be increased by $660 for each such family member in excess of one. In each case, the rate payable shall be reduced by the amount of the veteran's annual income and the annual income of such family members.

"(d)(1) If the veteran is in need of regular aid and attendance, the annual rate of improved pension payable monthly to the veteran under subsection (b) of this section shall be $5,340, reduced by the amount of the veteran's annual income.

"(2) If the veteran is in need of regular aid and attendance, the annual rate of improved pension payable monthly to the veteran under subsection (c) of this section shall be $6,384. If such veteran has two or more family members, as described in subsection (c) of this section, the annual improved pension rate shall be increased by $660 for each such family member in excess of one. In each case, the rate payable shall be reduced by the amount of the veteran's annual income and the annual income of such family members.

"(e) If the veteran has a disability rated as permanent and total and (1) has additional disability or disabilities independently ratable at 60 per centum or more, or (2) by reason of a disability or disabilities, is permanently housebound but does not qualify for improved pension at the aid and attendance rate under subsection (d) of this section, the annual rate of improved pension payable monthly to the veteran under subsection (b) of this section shall be $4,016, and the annual rate of improved pension payable monthly to the veteran under subsection (c) of this section shall be $5,060. If such veteran has two or more family members, as described in subsection (c) of this section, the annual improved pension rate shall be increased by $660 for each such family member in excess of one. In each case, the rate payable shall be reduced by the amount of the veteran's annual income and the annual income of such family members.

"(f) Where two veterans are married to one another and each meets the disability and service requirements of this section (as prescribed in subsections (a) and (h), respectively, of this section), the annual rates of improved pension payable monthly to such veterans shall be as provided in this subsection. The annual rate of improved pension payable monthly to such veterans shall be a combined annual rate of $4,284. If either veteran is in need of regular aid and attendance, such annual rate shall be $6,384. If both veterans are in need of regular aid and attendance, such annual rate shall be $8,484. If either veterans would be entitled (if not married to a veteran) to the rate provided for under subsection (e) of this section, such annual rate shall be $5,060. If both veterans would be entitled (if not married to one another) to such rate, such annual rate shall be $5,836. If one veteran is in need of regular aid and attendance and the other would be entitled (if not married to a veteran) to the rate provided for under subsection (e) of this section, such annual rate shall be $7,160. In each case, the annual rate shall be increased by $660 for each child to whose support either veteran is, or both veterans are, reasonably contributing and reduced by the amount of the annual income of both veterans and the annual income of each such child.

"(g) The amount of improved pension payable to any veteran under subsection (b), (c), (d), (e), or (f) of this section shall be increased by an amount equal to 25 per centum of the amount otherwise payable in the case of veterans of a period of war if veterans of such period of war were not provided educational benefits or home loan benefits similar to those provided to veterans of later periods of war under chapters 34 and 37, respectively, of this title or under prior corresponding provisions of law.

"(h) A veteran meets the service requirements of this section if such veteran served in the active military, naval, or air service—

"(1) for ninety days or more during a period of war;

"(2) during a period of war and was discharged or released from such service for a service-connected disability;

"(3) for a period of ninety consecutive days or more and such period began or ended during a period of war; or

"(4) for an aggregate of ninety days or more in two or more separate periods of service during more than one period of war.

"(i)(1) The Administrator shall provide that, for the purpose of determining whether or not a veteran is permanently and totally disabled, rating for service-connected disabilities may be combined with ratings for non-service-connected disabilities.

"(2) Where a veteran is found to be entitled under this section to improved pension and is also entitled to compensation for a service-connected disability, the Administrator shall pay such veteran only the greater benefit.

"(3) Where a veteran is found to be entitled under this section to improved pension on the basis of such veteran's own service and is also entitled to improved pension on the basis of any other person's service, the Administrator shall pay such veteran only the greater benefit.

"(j) Notwithstanding subsections (b), (c), (d), (e), and (f) of this section, benefits under this section may be paid less frequently than monthly where the amount of the annual benefit would be less than 4 per centum of the maximum annual rate payable to a veteran under subsection (b) of this section.

"§ 562. Improved pension for surviving spouses of veterans of a period of war

"(a) The Administrator shall pay improved pension at the rate prescribed by this section to the surviving spouse of each veteran of a period of war who met the service requirements prescribed in section 561(h) of this title or who at the time of death was receiving (or entitled to receive) compensation or retirement pay for a service-connected disability.

"(b)(1) If there is no child, or if no child is in the custody of the surviving spouse, improved pension shall be paid to the surviving spouse monthly at the annual rate of $2,172, reduced by the amount of the surviving spouse's annual income.

"(2) If there is a surviving spouse who has custody of a child, improved pension shall be paid to the surviving spouse monthly at the annual rate of $2,868. If the surviving spouse has custody of two or more children, the annual improved pension rate shall be increased by $660 for each such child in excess of one. In each case, the rate payable shall be reduced by the amount of the surviving spouse's annual income and the annual income of such child or children.

"(c)(1)(A) If there is no child, or if the surviving spouse does not have custody of a child, and the surviving spouse is permanently and totally disabled from disability not the result of the surviving spouse's willful misconduct, improved pension shall be paid to such surviving spouse monthly at the annual rate of $3,240, reduced by the amount of such surviving spouse's annual income.

"(B) If such surviving spouse has custody of one or more children, improved pension shall be paid to the surviving spouse monthly at the annual rate of $4,284, increased by $660 for each child in excess of one, and reduced by the amount of the surviving spouse's annual income and the annual income of such child or children.

"(2) If there is a surviving spouse and (A) the surviving spouse has custody of a child six years of age or under, or (B) there is residing with the surviving spouse a child who, before attaining the age of eighteen years, became permanently incapable of self-support and depends upon the surviving spouse for over one-half of such child's support, improved pension shall be paid to such surviving spouse monthly at the annual rate of $4,284. If such surviving spouse has custody of one or more additional children, or if there is residing with the surviving spouse one or more additional children who so became permanently incapable of self-support and depend to such extent upon the surviving spouse for support, the annual improved pension rate shall be increased by $660 for each such additional child. In each case, the rate payable shall be reduced by the amount of the surviving spouse's annual income and the annual income of such child or children.

"(d)(1) If a surviving spouse who is entitled to improved pension under subsection (c)(1)(A) of this section is in need of regular aid and attendance, the annual rate of improved pension payable monthly to the surviving spouse thereunder shall be $5,340, reduced by the amount of the surviving spouse's annual income.

"(2) If a surviving spouse who is entitled to improved pension under subsection (c)(1)(B) of this section is in need of regular aid and attendance, the annual rate of improved pension payable monthly to the surviving spouse thereunder shall be $6,384. If there are two or more children in such surviving spouse's custody, the annual improved pension rate shall be increased by $660 for each such child in excess of one. In each case, the rate payable shall be reduced by the amount of the surviving spouse's annual income and the annual income of the child or children in the custody of the surviving spouse.

"(e) No improved pension shall be paid to a surviving spouse of a veteran under this section unless the spouse was married to the veteran—

"(1) before (A) March 4, 1917, in the case of a surviving spouse of an Indian war veteran, (B) January 1, 1938, in the case of a surviving spouse of a Spanish-American War veteran, (C) December 14, 1944, in the case of a surviving spouse of a Mexican border period or World War I veteran, (D) January 1, 1957, in the case of a surviving spouse of a World War II veteran, (E) February 1, 1965, in the case of a surviving spouse of a Korean conflict veteran, or (F) May 8, 1985, in the case of a surviving spouse of a Vietnam era veteran;

"(2) for one year or more; or

"(3) for any period of time if a child was born of the marriage, or was born to them before the marriage.

"(f) Notwithstanding subsections (b), (c) and (d) of this section, benefits under this section may be paid less frequently than monthly where the amount of the annual benefit would be less than 4 per centum of the maximum annual rate payable to a veteran under section 561(b) of this title.

"§ 563. Improved pension for surviving children of veterans of a period of war

"(a) The Administrator shall pay to each surviving child, who is not in the custody of a surviving spouse eligible for improved pension under section 562 of this title and who is not a child described in section 562(c)(2)(B) of this title for whom a surviving spouse is receiving increased improved pension, of each veteran of a period of war who met the service requirements prescribed in section 561(h) of this title, or who at the time of death was receiving (or entitled to receive) compensation or retirement pay for a service-connected disability, improved pension monthly (1) at the annual rate of $660, reduced by the amount of such child's annual income, or (2) if such child is residing with a person or persons legally responsible for such child's support under the laws of the State in which such child resides, at an annual rate equal to the amount by which the appropriate annual rate provided under section 562 of this title exceeds the annual income of such child and such person or persons, but in no event exceeding the amount by which $660 exceeds the annual income of such child. The appropriate annual rate under such section shall be determined in accordance with regulations which the Administrator shall prescribe, and the income of such child and such person or persons shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of section 564 of this title.

"(b) Notwithstanding subsection (a) of this section, benefits under this section may be paid less frequently than monthly where the amount of the annual benefit would be less than 4 per centum of the maximum annual rate payable to a veteran under section 561(b) of this title.

"§ 564. Determinations with respect to annual income; income exclusions

"(a) In determining annual income under this subchapter, all payments of any kind or from any source (including such salary, retirement or annuity payments, or similar income as has been waived, irrespective of whether the waiver was made pursuant to statute, contract, or otherwise; but not including improved pension benefits under this subchapter) shall be included except for—

"(1) donations from public or private relief or welfare organizations;

"(2) amounts equal to amounts paid by a spouse for the expenses of a veteran's last illness, and by a surviving spouse or child of a deceased veteran for—

"(A) the veteran's just debts,

"(B) the expenses of the veteran's last illness, and

"(C) the expenses of the veteran's burial to the extent that such expenses are not reimbursed under chapter 23 of this title;

"(3) amounts equal to amounts paid—

"(A) by a veteran for the last illness and burial of the veteran's deceased spouse or child, or

"(B) by a spouse of a living veteran or the surviving spouse of a deceased veteran for the last illness and burial of a child of such veteran;

"(4) proceeds of fire insurance policies;

"(5) profit realized from the disposition of real or personal property other than in the course of a business;

"(6) amounts in joint accounts in banks and similar institutions acquired by reason of death of the other joint owner;

"(7)(A) except as provided in subclause (B) of this clause, $780, plus one-half of the amount which exceeds $780, of (i) the current-work income of the veteran and the veteran's spouse and, subject to the exclusions set forth in subclause (C) of this clause, of any child or children for whom the veteran is receiving increased improved pension under section 561 (c), (d), (e), or (f) of this title, (ii) the current-work income of the surviving spouse and, subject to the exclusions set forth in subclause (C) of this clause, of any child or children for whom the surviving spouse is receiving increased improved pension under section 562 (b), (c), or (d) of this title, or (iii) subject to the exclusions set forth in subclause (C) of this clause, the current-work income of each surviving child receiving improved pension under section 563 of this title;

"(B) in the case of a veteran or surviving spouse in need of regular aid and attendance, $1,560, plus one-half of the amount which exceeds $1,560, of (i) the current-work income of the veteran and the veteran's spouse and, subject to the exclusions set forth in subclause (C) of this clause, of any child or children for whom the veteran is receiving increased improved pension under section 561 (c), (d), (e), or (f) of this title, or (ii) the current-work income of the surviving spouse and, subject to the exclusions set forth in subclause (C) of this clause, of any child or children for whom the surviving spouse is receiving increased improved pension under section 562(d)(2) of this title; and

"(C)(i) any current-work income of any child, including any surviving child, so long as such child is not required, by virtue of the amount of such income, to file an income tax return under the provisions of section 6012(a)(1)(A)(i) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6012(a)(1)(A)(i)), to the extent that such current-work income does not exceed the amount specified in such section; and

"(ii) any current-work income of any child, including any surviving child, who is pursuing a postsecondary course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training, to the extent of amounts paid by such child in the previous calendar year for such course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training, including amounts paid for tuition, fees, books, and materials;

"(8) amounts equal to amounts paid in the previous calendar year by the veteran, the veteran's spouse, the surviving spouse, or by or on behalf of the surviving child or children for unreimbursed medical expenses to the extent that—

"(A) such amounts exceed the lesser of—

"(i) $100, or

"(ii) 5 percent of the annual income of the veteran, the surviving spouse, or the surviving child or children (including the income of any person or persons with whom such child is residing if such person or persons are legally responsible for such child's support under the laws of the State in which such child resides), as the case may be, and

"(B) the Administrator determines, under regulations which the Administrator shall prescribe, that such expenses were reasonably necessary for the health needs of—

"(i) the veteran,

"(ii) the veteran's spouse or children for whom the veteran is receiving increased improved pension under section 561 (c), (d), (e), or (f) of this title,

"(iii) the surviving spouse,

"(iv) any child or children for whom the surviving spouse is receiving increased improved pension under section 562 (b), (c), or (d) of this title, or

"(v) the surviving child or children;

but, if the Administrator, has determined that adequate health-care services of the same kind as those for which an exclusion had been granted in a previous year were readily available at a facility operated by the Veterans' Administration, expenses for health-care services incurred more than thirty days after the Administrator has notified the veteran, surviving spouse, or surviving child or children, as appropriate, of the Administrator's determination shall not be taken into consideration in determining the amount excludable under this clause if the Administrator further determines that adequate health-care services of the same kind continued to be so available during the period in which such expenses were incurred;

"(9) in the case of a veteran or surviving spouse in need of regular aid and attendance, amounts equal to amounts paid in the previous calendar year by such veteran or surviving spouse for unreimbursed expenses incurred for travel to and from such veteran's or surviving spouse's place of employment, to the extent that such amounts exceed the reasonable expenses which would have been incurred by a nondisabled person using an appropriate means of transportation (public transportation if reasonably available) for such travel; and

"(10) in the case of a veteran or surviving spouse pursuing a course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training, amounts equal to amounts paid in the previous calendar year by such veteran or surviving spouse for such course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training, including amounts paid for tuition, fees, books, and materials, and in the case of a veteran or surviving spouse in need of regular aid and attendance, amounts paid for unusual transportation expenses (determined in the same manner as in clause (9) of this subsection).

"(b)(1) Before applying any of the exclusions from annual income provided for under clause (7) of subsection (a) of this section, the Administrator shall apply, first to income other than current-work income and next to current-work income, all of the exclusions from annual income provided for under clauses (1) through (6) and (8) through (10) of such subsection.

"(2) In the case of a child, including a surviving child, the Administrator shall apply the exclusions from annual income provided for under subsection (a)(7)(C) of this section before applying any exclusion provided for under subsection (a)(7)(A) or (B), as the case may be, of this section.

"(3) The exclusions from annual income which are provided for in clause (7) of subsection (a) of this section shall apply to all current-work income not otherwise excluded under this section.

"(c) A veteran shall be considered as living with a spouse, even though they reside apart, unless they are estranged.

"(d) Where a fraction of a dollar is involved, annual income shall be fixed at the next lower dollar amount.

"(e) As used in this section, the term 'current-work income' means any income which is earned income within the meaning of section 401(c)(2)(A) and section 911(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 401(c)(2)(A) and 911(b)).

"§ 565. Net worth limitation

"(a) The Administrator shall deny or discontinue payment of imported pension to a veteran under section 561 of this title when the corpus of the estate or estates of the veteran, the veteran's spouse, if any, and any child or children for whom the veteran is receiving increased improved pension under subsection (c), (d), (e), or (f) of section 561 of this title, is such that under all the circumstances, including consideration of the veteran's income, it is reasonable that some part of the corpus of such estate or estates be consumed for the veteran's maintenance, excluding from the corpus of the estate of such child or children reasonable amounts set aside for educational or other similarly worthwhile vocational purposes for the benefit of such child or children.

"(b) The Administrator shall deny or discontinue payment of improved pension to a surviving spouse under section 562 of this title when the corpus of the estate or estates of the surviving spouse and any child or children for whom the surviving spouse is receiving increased improved pension under subsection (b), (c), or (d) of section 562 of this title, is such that under all the circumstances, including consideration of the surviving spouse's income, it is reasonable that some part of the corpus of such estate or estates be consumed for the surviving spouse's maintenance, excluding from the corpus of the estate of such child or children reasonable amounts set aside for educational or other similarly worthwhile vocational purposes for the benefit of such child or children.

"(c) The Administrator shall deny or discontinue payment of improved pension to a surviving child under section 563 of this title when the corpus of the estate of the surviving child is such that under all the circumstances, including consideration of such child's income, the income of a person (or persons) with whom such child is residing who is legally responsible for such child's support under the laws of the State in which such child resides, and the corpus of the estate of such person (or persons), it is reasonable that some part of the corpus of such estate or estates be consumed for the surviving child's maintenance, excluding from the corpus of the estate of such child reasonable amounts set aside for educational or other similarly worthwhile vocational purposes for the benefit of such child.

"§ 566. Election of improved pension benefits

"Except as provided in section 508 of this title, any veteran receiving pension under section 521 of this title, any surviving spouse receiving pension under section 541 of this title, any child receiving pension under section 542 of this title, and any veteran, surviving spouse, or child receiving pension under section 9(b) of the Veterans' Pension Act of 1959 may elect at any time to receive improved pension under this subchapter in lieu of pension payable to such veteran, surviving spouse, or child under any such section. If at any time improved pension is paid pursuant to such an election, the election shall be irrevocable.

"§ 567. Definitions

"For purposes of this subchapter—

"(1) The term 'child' means the veteran's child.

"(2) The term 'veteran' includes a person who has completed at least two years of honorable active military, naval, or air service, as certified by the Secretary concerned, but whose death in such service was not in line of duty."

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 15 of such title is amended by striking out

"Subchapter IV—Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard Medal of Honor Roll

"560. Medal of honor roll; persons eligible.
"561. Certificate.
"562. Special provisions relating to pension."

and inserting in lieu thereof

"Subchapter IV—Improved Pension for Non-Service-Connected Disability or Death

"561. Improved pension for veterans of a period of war.
"562. Improved pension for surviving spouses of veterans of a period of war.
"563. Improved pension for surviving children of veterans of a period of war.
"564. Determinations with respect to annual income; income exclusions.
"565. Net worth limitation.
"566. Election of improved pension benefits.
"567. Definitions.

"Subchapter V—Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard Medal of Honor Roll

"571. Medal of honor roll; persons eligible.
"572. Certificate.
"573. Special provisions relating to pension.".

(c) Subsection (a) of section 503 of such title is amended by striking out "In determining annual income under this chapter," and inserting in lieu thereof "In determining annual income under subchapters II and III of this chapter,".

(d) Section 504 of such title is amended by striking out "and III" and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and "III, and IV".

(e) Section 506 of such title is amended by—

(1) redesignating subsection (b) as subsection (c);

(2) inserting after subsection (a) the following new subsection (b):

"(b) As a condition of granting or continuing improved pension under section 561, 562, or 563 of this title, the Administrator—

"(1) may require from any person applying for, or in receipt of, improved pension such information, proofs, or evidence as the Administrator determines to be necessary in order to determine the annual income and the corpus of the estate of such person, and of any spouse and child for whom the person is receiving or is to receive increased improved pension, and, in the case of a surviving child, of any person with whom such child is residing who is legally responsible for such child's support under the laws of the State in which the child resides;

"(2) shall require that any such applicant or recipient, other than a person in any category of persons whose sole incomes are regularly received and derived from a Federal program and who are exempted from the requirements of this clause under regulations which the Administrator shall prescribe, file each year with the Veterans' Administration (on the form prescribed for such purpose by the Administrator) a report showing—

"(A) the total income which such applicant or recipient (and any such spouse or dependent child) received during the preceding year, the corpus of the estate of such applicant or recipient (and of any such spouse or dependent child) at the end of such year, and in the case of a surviving child, the income and corpus of the estate of any person with whom such child is residing who is legally responsible for such child's support under the laws of the State in which such child resides;

"(B) such applicant's or recipient's estimate for the then current year of the total income such applicant or recipient (and any such spouse or dependent child) expects to receive and of any expected increase in the corpus of the estate of such applicant or recipient (and of any such spouse or dependent child); and

"(C) in the case of a surviving child, the total income of any person with whom such child is residing who is legally responsible for such child's support under the laws of the State in which such child resides and of any expected increase in the corpus of the estate of such person;

"(3) shall require that any such applicant or recipient promptly file a revised report whenever there is a material change in the estimated annual income of such applicant or recipient (or of any such spouse or dependent child) or a material change in such applicant's or recipient's estimate of the corpus of the estate of such applicant or recipient (or of any such spouse or dependent child), and in the case of a surviving child, a material change in the estimated annual income or corpus of the estate of any person with whom such child is residing who is legally responsible for such child's support under the laws of the State in which such child resides; and

"(4) shall require that any such applicant or recipient promptly notify the Administrator of any change in the dependency status of any spouse or child for whom such applicant or recipient is receiving or is to receive increased improved pension."; and

(3) amending subsection (c) (as redesignated by clause (1) of this subsection) by striking out "or 542" and inserting in lieu thereof "542, 561, 562, or 563".

(f) Section 507 of such title is amended by inserting "or IV" after "subchapter II".

(g) Paragraph (3) of section 512(a) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(3)(A) Except as provided in section 508 of this title, any veteran eligible for pension under this section shall, if such veteran so elects, be paid, in lieu of pension under this section or section 521 of this title, improved pension at the rates prescribed by section 561 of this title and under the conditions (other than the service requirements) applicable to improved pension paid under such section 561. Notwithstanding subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, if at any time improved pension is paid pursuant to such an election, the election shall be irrevocable.

"(B) In the case of any veteran of the Spanish-American War who is receiving, or entitled to receive, pension based on a need for regular aid and attendance, the Administrator shall pay monthly to such veteran pension at the rate which (i) is provided for under subsection (a)(1)(B) of this section, or (ii) would be payable to such veteran if such veteran were receiving pension under section 521 of this title, whichever is the greater. Each change in the amount of pension payment required by this subparagraph shall be effective as of the first day of the month during which the facts of the particular case warrant such change, and shall be made without specific application therefor.".

(h) Section 521 of such title is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(i)(1) Except as provided in section 508 of this title, no veteran who makes application for and becomes entitled to pension on or after the effective date of the improved pension program provided for under section 561 of this title may be paid pension under this section.

"(2) Any veteran who made application for pension under this section prior to such effective date may be paid pension under this section if (A) the Administrator determines, after such date, that such veteran is entitled, on the basis of such application, to pension, and (B) such veteran elects to receive pension under this section in lieu of improved pension under section 561 of this title.".

(i) Section 532 of such title is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) Any surviving spouse eligible for pension under this section shall, if such surviving spouse so elects, be paid, in lieu of pension at the dates prescribed by section 562 of this title and under the conditions (other than the service requirements) applicable under such section 562 to surviving spouses of veterans of a period of war. If at any time improved pension is paid pursuant to such an election, the election shall be irrevocable.".

(j) Section 533 of such title is amended by inserting "(a)" before "Whenever" and inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Any child eligible for pension under this section shall, if such child so elects, be paid, in lieu of pension under this section or section 542 of this title, improved pension at the rate prescribed by section 563 of this title and under the conditions (other than the service requirements) applicable under such section 563 to children of veterans of a period of war. If at any time improved pension is paid pursuant to such an election, the election shall be irrevocable.".

(k) Section 534 of such title is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) Any surviving spouse eligible for pension under this section shall, if such surviving spouse so elects, be paid, in lieu of pension under this section or section 541 of this title, improved pension at the rates prescribed by section 562 of this title and under the conditions (other than the service requirements) applicable under such section 562 to surviving spouses of veterans of a period of war. If at any time improved pension is paid pursuant to such an election, the election shall be irrevocable.".

(l) Section 535 of such title is amended by inserting "(a)" before "Whenever" and inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Any child eligible for pension under this section shall, if such child so elects, be paid, in lieu of pension under this section or section 542 of this title, improved pension at the rate prescribed by section 563 of this title and under the conditions (other than the service requirements) applicable under such section 563 to children of veterans of a period of war. If at any time improved pension is paid pursuant to such an election, the election shall be irrevocable.".

(m) Paragraph (1) of section 536(d) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(1) Except as provided in section 508 of this title, any surviving spouse eligible for pension under this section shall, if such surviving spouse so elects, be paid, in lieu of pension under this section or section 541 of this title, improved pension at the rates prescribed by section 562 of this title and under the conditions (other than the service requirements) applicable under such section 562 to surviving spouses of veterans of a period of war. Notwithstanding paragraph (2) of this subsection, if at any time improved pension is paid pursuant to such an election, the election shall be irrevocable.".

(n) Section 537 of such title is amended by inserting "(a)" before "Whenever" and inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Except as provided in section 508 of this title, any child eligible for pension under this section shall, if such child so elects, be paid, in lieu of pension under this section or section 542 of this title, improved pension at the rate prescribed by section 563 of this title and under the conditions (other than the service requirements) applicable under such section 563 to children of veterans of a period of war. If at any time improved pension is paid pursuant to such an election, the election shall be irrevocable.".

(o) Section 541 of such title is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g)(1) Except as provided in section 508 of this title, no surviving spouse who makes application for and becomes entitled to pension on or after the effective date of the improved pension program provided for under section 562 of this title may be paid pension under this section.

"(2) Any surviving spouse who made application for pension under this section prior to such effective date may be paid pension under this section if (A) the Administrator determines, after such date, that such surviving spouse is entitled, on the basis of such application, to pension, and (B) such surviving spouse elects to receive pension under this section in lieu of improved pension under section 562 of this title.".

(p) Section 542 of such title is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) Except as provided in section 508 of this title, no surviving child, not in the custody of a surviving spouse eligible for pension under section 541 of this title or improved pension under section 562 of this title, who makes application for and becomes entitled to pension on or after the effective date of the improved pension program provided for under section 563 of this title may be paid pension under this section.

"(2) Any surviving child, not in the custody of a surviving spouse eligible for improved pension under section 562 of this title, who made application for pension under this section prior to such effective date may be paid pension under this section if (A) the Administrator determines, after such date, that such surviving child is entitled, on the basis of such application, to pension, and (B) such child elects to receive pension under this section in lieu of improved pension under section 563 of this title.".

(2) The second sentence of subsection (a) of section 572 (as redesignated by subsection (a)(1) of this section) of such title is amended by striking out "560" and inserting in lieu thereof "571".

(3) Subsection (b) of section 572 (as redesignated by subsection (a)(1) of this section) of such title is amended by striking out "562" and inserting in lieu thereof "573".

(4) The first sentence of subsection (c) of section 572 (as redesignated by subsection (a)(1) of this section) of such title is amended by striking out "562" and inserting in lieu thereof "573".

(5) Subsection (a) of section 573 (as redesignated by subsection (a)(1) of this section) of such title is amended by striking out "561" and "560" and inserting in lieu thereof "572" and "571", respectively.

TITLE II—IMPROVED DEPENDENCY AND INDEMNITY COMPENSATION FOR SURVIVING PARENTS

SEC. 201. (a) Chapter 13 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) inserting "(1)" before "The" in section 401 and inserting at the end of such section the following new paragraph:

"(2) The term 'dependency and indemnity compensation' as used in sections 410, 417, and 418 of this chapter includes improved dependency and indemnity compensation as provided for under section 416 of this chapter.";

(2) redesignating sections 416 and 417 as sections 417 and 418, respectively;

(3) inserting at the end of section 415 the following new subsection:

"(i)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (4) of this subsection, no parent who makes application for and becomes entitled to dependency and indemnity compensation on or after the effective date of the improved dependency and indemnity compensation program provided for under section 416 of this title may be paid dependency and indemnity compensation under this section.

"(2) Any parent who made application under this section prior to such effective date may be paid dependency and indemnity compensation under this section if (A) the Administrator determines, after such date, that such parent is entitled, on the basis of such application, to dependency and indemnity compensation, and (B) such parent elects to receive dependency and indemnity compensation under this section in lieu of improved dependency and indemnity compensation under section 416 of this title.

"(3) Except as provided in subsection (g) of section 416 of this title, any parent receiving dependency and indemnity compensation benefits under this chapter and any parent receiving death compensation benefits under subchapter III or V of chapter 11 of this title who meets the eligibility requirements of the improved dependency and indemnity compensation program provided for under section 416 of this title may elect at any time to receive improved dependency and indemnity compensation under such section 416 in lieu of such dependency and indemnity compensation under this chapter or death compensation under either such subchapter. If at any time improved dependency and indemnity compensation is paid pursuant to such an election, the election shall be irrevocable.

"(4) Any parent residing outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia on the effective date of the improved dependency and indemnity compensation program provided for under section 416 of this title who becomes eligible for dependency and indemnity compensation on or after such date shall be eligible, but only as long as such parent continuously resides outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia after such date and such parent qualifies for benefits under this section, to apply for and receive benefits under this section."; and

(4) inserting after section 415 the following new section 416:

"§ 416. Improved dependency and indemnity compensation to parents

"(a) Improved dependency and indemnity compensation shall be paid to the parent or parents of a deceased veteran at the rate prescribed by this section if during the one-year period immediately preceding such veteran's death the veteran contributed one-half or more to the support of such parent or parents.

"(b) If there is only one parent, or there are two parents living apart, improved dependency and indemnity compensation shall be paid to such parent or to each such parent monthly at the annual rate of $3,240, unless such parent (or parents) is entitled to improved dependency and indemnity compensation at the rate provided by subsection (d) of this section, reduced by the amount of such parent's or each such parent's income and the income of the spouse of a remarried parent, if such parent is living with such spouse, to the extent that such spouse's income is reasonably available to or for such parent.

"(c) If there are two parents living together, improved dependency and indemnity compensation shall be paid to such parents monthly at the annual rate of $4,284, reduced by the amount of such parents' annual income.

"(d)(1) If a parent entitled to improved dependency and indemnity compensation under subsection (b) of this section is in need of regular aid and attendance, the annual rate of improved dependency and indemnity compensation payable monthly to such parent shall be $5,340, reduced by the amount of such parent's annual income and the income of the spouse of a remarried parent, if such parent is living with such spouse, to the extent that such spouse's income is reasonably available to or for such parent.

"(2) If there are two parents living together who are entitled to improved dependency and indemnity compensation under subsection (c) of this section and one parent is in need of regular aid and attendance, the annual rate of improved dependency and indemnity compensation payable monthly to such parents shall be $6,384. If both such parents are in such need of regular aid and attendance, the annual rate payable monthly to such parents shall be $8,484. The rate payable shall be reduced by the amount of the parents' annual income.

"(e)(1) Where a parent is found to be entitled to improved dependency and indemnity compensation under this section and such parent is also entitled to improved pension under section 561, 562, or 563 of this title, the Administrator shall pay such parent only the greater benefit.

"(2) Where a parent is found to be entitled to improved dependency and indemnity compensation under this section and such parent is also a veteran entitled to compensation for a service-connected disability, the Administrator shall pay such parent only the greater benefit.

"(f) Notwithstanding subsections (b), (c), and (d) of this section, benefits under this section may be paid less frequently than monthly where the amount of the annual benefit would be less than 4 per centum of the maximum annual rate payable to a parent under subsection (b) of this section.

"(g) Improved dependency and indemnity compensation benefits payable under this section shall not be paid to any person residing outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia.

"(h)(1) In determining annual income under this section, all payments of any kind or from any source (including such salary, retirement or annuity payments, or similar income as has been waived, irrespective of whether the waiver was made pursuant to statute, contract, or otherwise; but not including improved dependency and indemnity compensation benefits under this section) shall be included except—

"(A) donations from public or private relief or welfare organizations;

"(B) amounts equal to amounts paid by a parent for the expenses of a veteran's last illness, and by a parent of a deceased veteran for—

"(i) the veteran's just debts,

"(ii) the expenses of the veteran's last illness, and

"(iii) the expenses of the veteran's burial to the extent that such expenses are not reimbursed under chapter 23 of this title;

"(C) amounts equal to amounts paid by a parent for the last illness and burial of the parent's deceased spouse;

"(D) proceeds of fire insurance policies;

"(E) profit realized from the disposition of real or personal property other than in the course of a business;

"(F) amounts in joint accounts in banks and similar institutions acquired by reason of the death of the other joint owner;

"(G)(i) except as provided in subclause (ii) of this clause, $780, plus one-half of the amount which exceeds $780, of (I) the current-work income of such parent or parents, and (II) in the case of a parent who has remarried, the current-work income of such parent and such parent's spouse with whom such parent is living; or

"(ii) in the case of a parent in need of regular aid and attendance, $1,560, plus one-half of the amount which exceeds $1,560, of (I) the current-work income of such parent or parents, and (II) in the case of a parent who has remarried, the current-work income of such parent and such parent's spouse with whom such parent is living;

"(H) amounts equal to amounts paid in the previous calendar year by a parent for unreimbursed medical expenses which exceed the lesser of (i) $100, or (ii) 5 per centum of the annual income of the parent, parents, or, in the case of a parent who has remarried, the annual income of such parent and such parent's spouse with whom such parent is living, to the extent that the Administrator determines, under regulations which the Administrator shall prescribe, that such expenses were reasonably necessary for the health needs of the parent or parents; illness,

"(I) in the case of a parent in need of regular aid and attendance, amounts equal to amounts paid in the previous calendar year by such parent for unreimbursed expenses incurred for travel to and from such parent's place of employment, to the extent that such amounts exceed the reasonable expenses which would have been incurred by a nondisabled person using an appropriate means of transportation (public transportation if reasonably available) for such travel; and

"(J) in the case of a parent pursuing a course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training, amounts equal to amounts paid in the previous calendar year by such parent for such course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training, including amounts paid for tuition, fees, books, and materials, and in the case of a parent in need of regular aid and attendance, amounts paid for unusual transportation expenses (determined in the same manner as in clause (I) of this paragraph).

"(2)(A) Before applying any of the exclusions from annual income provided for under clause (G) of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Administrator shall apply all of the exclusions from annual income provided for under clauses (A) through (F) and (H) through (J) of such paragraph, first to income other than current-work income and next to current-work income.

"(B) The exclusions from annual income which are provided for in clause (G) of paragraph (1) of this subsection shall apply to all current-work income not otherwise excluded under this subsection.

"(i) A parent shall be considered as living with a spouse, even though they reside apart, unless they are estranged.

"(j) As used in subsection (h) of this section, the term 'current-work income' means any income which is earned income within the meaning of section 401(c)(2)(A) and section 911(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 401(c)(2)(A) and 911(b)).

"(k) The Administrator shall deny or discontinue payment of improved dependency and indemnity compensation to a parent under this section when the corpus of the estate or estates of the parent, the parents, and the spouse of a remarried parent with whom such parent is living, is such that under all the circumstances, including the consideration of such parent's, parent's, or spouse's income, it is reasonable that some part of the corpus of such estate or estates be consumed for the parent's or parents' maintenance.

"(l) As a condition of granting or continuing improved dependency and indemnity compensation under this section, the Administrator—

"(1) may require from any parent applying for, or in receipt of, improved dependency and indemnity compensation such information, proofs, or evidence as the Administrator determines to be necessary in order to determine the annual income and the corpus of the estate of such parent;

"(2) shall require that any such parent, other than a person in any category of persons whose sole income is regularly received and derived from a Federal program and who are exempted from the requirements of this clause under regulations which the Administrator shall prescribe, file each year with the Veterans' Administration (on the form prescribed for such purpose by the Administrator) a report showing (A) the total income which such parent received (and in the case of a remarried parent, the total income which such remarried parent's spouse received) during the preceding year, and the corpus of the estate of such parent (and in the case of a remarried parent, the corpus of the estate of such remarried parent's spouse) at the end of that year, and (B) such parent's estimate for the then current year of the total income such parent expects to receive (and in the case of a remarried parent, the total income which such remarried parent's spouse expects to receive) and of any expected increase in the corpus of the estate of such parent (and in the case of a remarried parent, any expected increase in the corpus of the estate of such remarried parent's spouse); and

"(3) shall require that any such parent promptly file a revised report whenever there is a material change in the estimated annual income of such parent (or such spouse) or a material change in such parent's estimate of the corpus of the estate of such parent (or such spouse).

"(m) Where a fraction of a dollar is involved, annual income shall be fixed at the next lower dollar amount.

"(n) If the Administrator ascertains that there have been overpayments to a parent under this section, the Administrator shall deduct such overpayments (unless waived) from any future payments made to such parent under this section.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 13 of such title is amended by striking out

"416. Dependency and indemnity compensation in cases of prior deaths.
"417. Restriction on payments under this chapter."

and inserting in lieu thereof

"416. Improved dependency and indemnity compensation to parents.
"417. Dependency and indemnity compensation in cases of prior deaths.
"418. Restrictions on payments under this chapter.".

(c) Paragraph (2) of section 417(a) (as redesignated by subsection (a)(2) of this section) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(2) Except as provided in subsection (g) of section 416 of this title, any parent receiving death compensation under subchapter III or V of chapter 11 of this title by reason of a death occurring before January 1, 1957, shall, if such parent so elects, be paid improved dependency and indemnity compensation at the rates prescribed by section 416 of this title and under the conditions applicable under that section to parents of veterans who deaths occurred on or after January 1, 1957. If at any time improved dependency and indemnity compensation is paid pursuant to such an election, the election shall be irrevocable".

TITLE III—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

SEC. 301. Paragraph (14) of section 101 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting "or other periodic" after "monthly".

SEC. 302. Paragraph (15) of section 101 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting "or other periodic" after "monthly".

SEC. 303. Clause (4) of subsection (b) of section 3012 of title 38, United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"(4) by reason of change in income or corpus of estate shall be the last day of the calendar year in which the change occurred, except that such effective date shall be the last day of the month in which the change occurred for persons receiving payments under section 416, 561, 562, or 563 of this title;".

SEC. 304. (a) Chapter 53 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3112. Annual adjustment of certain benefit rates and income exclusions

"(a) Whenever, in any calendar year after 1978, benefit payments under title II of the Social Security Act are increased by a percentage effective with any month as a result of a determination made under section 215(i) of such Act, each of the dollar amounts in effect for such month for benefits payable under sections 416, 561, 562, and 563 of this title and each of the dollar amounts shown in subsection (h)(1)(G) of section 416 and subsection (a)(7) of section 564 of this title, as specified in such sections or subsections or as previously increased under this section, shall be increased by the same percentage (and rounded in such manner as the Administrator deems equitable and appropriate), effective beginning with benefits payable for such month; and such dollar amounts so increased shall be published in the Federal Register at the same time as the material required by section 215(a)(2)(D) of the Social Security Act to be published therein by reason of a determination under such section 215(i).

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, whenever benefit rates payable under sections 416, 561, 562, and 563 of this title are adjusted in accordance with subsection (a) of this section, the Administrator shall recompute the amount of annual improved pension payable to each veteran, surviving spouse, and surviving child, and the amount of annual improved dependency and indemnity compensation payable to each surviving parent, who is also entitled to receive payments under any other Federal program or programs, the rates of which are adjusted as a result of a determination made under section 215(i) of the Social Security Act. Any such recomputation shall be made on the basis of the annual rate of payments to a veteran, surviving spouse, surviving child, or surviving parent under such other Federal program or programs, as increased as a result of the determination made under section 215(i) of the Social Security Act; and the benefit rates recomputed under this subsection shall become effective beginning with the first month in which both the increase in benefit rates payable under sections 416, 561, 562, and 563 of this title and the increase in payments under such other Federal program or programs are effective.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 53 of such title is amended by inserting

"3111. Prohibition of certain benefit payments.".

SEC. 305. (a) In any case in which any person is receiving, on the effective date of this Act, pension under chapter 15 of title 38, United States Code, or under section 9(b) of the Veterans' Pension Act of 1959, or dependency and indemnity compensation under chapter 13 of such title, and such person, on or before the last day of the third calendar month following the month in which this Act became effective, elects to receive improved pension or improved dependency and indemnity compensation provided for in the amendments made by this Act, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall pay such person improved pension or improved dependency and indemnity compensation benefits retroactive to the effective date of this Act to the extent that payments under such improved pension program or improved dependency and indemnity compensation program, as the case may be, exceed pension or dependency and indemnity compensation benefits actually paid to such person.

(b) Nothing in the amendments made by this Act shall affect the eligibility of any person who is entitled to receive pension under section 521, 541, or 542 of title 38, United States Code, or under section 9(b) of the Veterans' Pension Act of 1959, or dependency and indemnity compensation under chapter 13 of title 38, United States Code, as in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act, to continue to receive pension or dependency and indemnity compensation under such section or such chapter as long as such person continues to qualify under such section or such chapter for such pension or dependency and indemnity compensation, as the case may be. The preceding sentence shall not apply in the case of any person for any period on and after the date on which such person is granted, pursuant to the application of such person, improved pension benefits under section 561, 562, or 563 of title 38, United States Code, or improved dependency and indemnity compensation under section 416 of such title, as amended by this Act.

SEC. 306. (a) Chapter 15 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 507 the following new section:

"§ 508. Special provision relating to persons residing outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia

"(a) Improved pension benefits provided for under subchapter IV of this chapter may not be paid to any person residing outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia.

"(b) Any person residing outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia on the effective date of this section who becomes eligible for pension on or after such date shall be eligible, but only as long as such person continuously resides outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia after such date and such person qualifies for benefits under subchapter II or III of this chapter, to apply for and receive benefits under section 521 in the case of a veteran, under section 541 in the case of a surviving spouse, or under section 542 in the case of a surviving child.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 15 of such title is amended by inserting

"508. Special provision relating to persons residing outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia."

"507 Disappearance.".

(c)(1) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall carry out a comprehensive study of the income characteristics of veterans of a period of war (as defined in section 101 (11) of title 38, United States Code) and their survivors who are residing outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia, including those who are receiving pension benefits under chapter 15 of title 38, United States Code, or under section 9(b) of the Veterans' Pension Act of 1959. The Administrator shall include in such study (A) an analysis of the issues involved in the payment of non-service-connected pension benefits to such persons, (B) analyses of such aspects of the economy of each foreign country and each territory, possession, and Commonwealth of the United States in which a substantial number of such persons reside as are relevant to such issues, such as the rate of inflation, the standard of living, and subsistence levels in such foreign country or such territory, possession, or Commonwealth, (C) estimates of the present and future costs of the payment of pension benefits to such persons, and (D) estimates of the potential costs of paying improved pension benefits to such persons.

(2) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall report to the Congress and the President, not later than February 1, 1979, the results of such study, together with the Administrator's recommendations as to the desirability of modifying the Veterans' Administration non-service-connected pension program for veterans of a period of war (as defined in section 101(11) of title 38, United States Code) and their survivors who are residing outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia and of extending eligibility for improved pension benefits (as provided for in sections 561, 562, and 563 of such title, as added by section 101(a)(2) of this Act) to such veterans and survivors, including recommendations as to the desirability of modifying such improved pension program for such persons if such eligibility were to be extended.

SEC. 307. Paragraph (1) of section 3203(a) of title 38, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(1)(A) Where any veteran having neither spouse nor child is being furnished domiciliary care by the Veterans' Administration, no pension in excess of $60 per month shall be paid to or for the veteran for any period after the end of the second full calendar month following the month of admission for such care.

"(B) Where any veteran having neither spouse nor child is being furnished hospital or nursing home care by the Veterans' Administration, no pension in excess of $60 per month shall be paid to or for the veteran for any period after (i) the end of the third full calendar month following the month of admission for such care, or (ii) the end of the sixth full calendar month following the month of admission for care in any case in which the Administrator finds that the receipt of pension benefits (to which the veteran is otherwise entitled) for three additional months will reasonably facilitate such veteran's ability to return to the community.

"(C) No pension in excess of $60 per month shall be paid to or for a veteran having neither spouse nor child for any period after the month in which such veteran is readmitted for care described in subparagraph (A) or (B) of this paragraph and furnished by the Veterans' Administration if such veteran is readmitted within six months of a period of care of not less than two full calendar months.".

SEC. 308. (a) Section 1682(b) of title 38, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) amending clause (6) to read as follows:

"(6) such application was filed with the administrator within 180 days after the date on which the degree, diploma, or certificate described in clause (5) of this subsection has been awarded to such veteran; and";

(2) striking out the semicolon and the word "and" at the end of clause (7) and inserting in lieu thereof a period; and

(3) striking out all of clause (8).

(b) The first sentence of section 1682A(c) of such title is amended by striking out "and matching amounts paid to the Administrator by a State or local governmental unit, as described in subsection (b)(8) of this section.".

(c) Section 1682A(d) of such title is amended by—

(1) striking out "33⅓ per centum" in clause (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "66⅔ per centum";

(2) inserting "or" at the end of clause (2);

(3) striking out "33⅓ per centum" in clause (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "66⅔ per centum"; and

(4) striking out the comma after "8700" in clause (3) and all that follows down through the word "amount" in clause (4).

(d) The amendments made by this section shall not create spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344). The amendments made by this section shall not take effect until, and only to the extent that, funds for the purpose of carrying out such amendments are specifically earmarked for such purpose in an appropriations Act enacted in the 96th or a later Congress.

SEC. 309. The Director, Office of Management and Budget shall prepare and submit to the Congress, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this act, a written report containing the following:

(1) A description of how the Veterans Administration and the Social Security Administration currently coordinate the delivery of Veterans' pension benefits, Social Security retirement and disability benefits, and Supplemental Security Income benefits to elderly and disabled persons.

(2) Recommendations for improving coordination among the programs referred to in paragraph (1), including legislation which would facilitate such improvement.

(3) A description of inconsistencies, inequities, and/or undesirable features in the treatment of needy persons under the programs referred to in paragraph (1).

(4) An assessment of the feasibility and desirability of reconciling unjustifiable differences among the programs referred to in paragraph (1) in terms of features such as: benefit structure, income counted in determining eligibility and the amount of benefits, limitations as assets, accounting period for determining eligibility, and other program feature.

TITLE IV—NAMING OF CERTAIN VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOSPITALS

SEC. 401. The Veterans' Administration hospital in Tampa, Florida, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "James A. Haley Veterans' Hospital". Any reference to such hospital in any law, regulation, document, map, record, or other paper of the United States shall be deemed to be a reference to the James A. Haley Veterans' Hospital.

SEC. 402. The Veterans' Administration hospital in Bedford, Massachusetts, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Edith Nourse Rogers Memorial Veterans' Hospital". Any reference to such hospital in any law, regulation, document, map, record, or other paper of the United States shall be deemed to be a reference to the Edith Nourse Rogers Memorial Veterans' Hospital.

TITLE V—EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 501. (a) The amendments made by this Act to title 38, United States Code, and the provisions of subsections (c) and (d) of section 304 of this Act shall become effective on October 1, 1978.

(b) All provisions of this Act other than those specified in subsection (a) of this section shall be effective on the date of enactment of this Act.

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to amend title 38, United States Code, in order to provide an improved pension program for non-service-connected disabled veterans of a period of war who are in need, for surviving spouses of veterans of a period of war who are in need, and for surviving children of veterans of a period of war who are in need; to provide for an improved dependency and indemnity compensation program for surviving parents of veterans who have died from service-connected disabilities who are in need; to provide for annual automatic cost-of-living adjustments in the improved pension and improved dependency and indemnity compensation programs; to prevent reductions in improved pension and improved dependency and indemnity compensation benefits solely attributable to cost-of-living increases in social security benefits; and for other purposes.".

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, in order to provide an improved pension program for non-service-connected disabled veterans of a period of war who are in need, for surviving spouses of veterans of a period of war who are in need, and for surviving children of veterans of a period of war who are in need; to provide for an improved dependency and indemnity compensation program for surviving parents of veterans who died from service-connected disabilities who are in need; to provide for annual automatic cost-of-living adjustments in the improved pension and improved dependency and indemnity compensation programs; to prevent reductions in improved pension and improved dependency and indemnity compensation benefits solely attributable to cost-of-living increases in social security benefits; and for other purposes.

Mr. CRANSTON. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. CHURCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CRANSTON. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 2384 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of the Senate's amendments to H.R. 10173.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The following subsequently occurred:)

SENATOR RANDOLPH SUPPORTS VETERANS BENEFITS BILL

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, earlier today I arrived in the Senate Chamber a few minutes late, being necessarily absent at the time of the vote on H.R. 10173, the Veterans' and Survivors' Pension Improvement Act.

I had desired to speak and would have spoken on this bill, a vital veterans measure.

I ask unanimous consent that my remarks at this time be placed in the RECORD following the vote on that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator means immediately prior to the vote.

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; I was not here and I think it is appropriate that the remarks appear after the vote. I think that would be proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the Chair.

The following statement contains remarks I would have made during the consideration of this vital veterans bill:

Mr. President, the basic purpose of the bill, of which I have the privilege to be a cosponsor, is to provide for a new, more equitable and adequate pension program for needy wartime veterans who are 65 years or older and for the needy surviving spouses and children of wartime veterans. Chairman Cranston is a dedicated leader in affirmative actions to aid veterans as are other memmers of our committee who join in bringing this bill to the Senate.

It is my belief that the existing pension program first, does not provide sufficient assistance to meet the needs of some eligible veterans and survivors; second, has developed certain inconsistencies and inequities which prevent it from operating in the most efficient and equitable manner; and third, subjects many pensioners annually to reduction in their pensions.

I have been particularly concerned that the present pension program can cause a reduction of a needy veteran's pension when social security payments are increased to compensate for rises in the cost of living. This denies increases to offset the impact of inflation.

The improved program is designed to achieve the following objectives: First, to assure an income standard above the Department of Labor's poverty guidelines so that all eligible veterans and survivors receive a pension commensurate with their need; second, prevent eligible veterans and survivors from the necessity to turn to welfare; third, treat similarly circumstanced veterans and survivors equally; fourth, guarantee that annual increases in improved pension benefits occur at the same rate and at the same time as cost-of-living increases in social security benefit rates—so that no person in the improved pension program will suffer a reduction in pension solely attributable to a cost-of-living increase in benefits under social security or any other Federal retirement program; and fifth, provide a 25 percent add-on in rates for World War I veterans.

Mr. President, my colleagues will vote the approval of this meritorious legislation. Our national Government faces many difficult choices among various competing, legitimate demands on its resources. I firmly believe that we must not, because of the passage of time since our Nation was engaged in large scale conflicts, discount the debt owed to those men and women who have served our Republic to keep us strong, free, and safe from invasion during a century in which powerful military forces have often threatened the security of our people. It is important that we remember the basic principle on which our veterans' benefits system was founded. This Nation owes its greatest debt to those members of the armed forces who have fought in the trenches, sailed the seas and flown the skies to protect our cherished freedoms and our responsibilities.

Mr. President, I thank our capable and cooperative Veterans' Affairs Committee staff for their helpfulness in bringing this legislation to fruition.

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HELMS. What is the pending business?

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will resume consideration of S. 2152, which the clerk will state by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2152) to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to authorize the United States to participate in the Supplementary Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund.

The Senate resumed consideration of S. 2152.

AMENDMENT NO. 2438

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to amendment No. 2438 of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. JAVITS. Whose amendment is that, Madam President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. JAVITS. What is it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Amendment No. 2438, the pending amendment by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, I ask that pending amendment No. 2438 be set aside and placed in order of the turns of votes.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, reserving the right to object, I did not hear that. What did the Senator want to do?

Mr. HELMS. I simply want to set the amendment aside so it will be voted on in the order in which the various amendments were debated.

Mr. JAVITS. I see.

Mr. HEINZ addressed the Chair.

Mr. JAVITS. I believe I still have the floor.

Mr. HEINZ. Madam President, reserving the right to object, and I hope I do not have to object, I assume that in agreeing to the Senator's request those of us who may be in opposition do not lose our right to move to table the amendment. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from North Carolina please repeat his request?

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, I simply ask unanimous consent that the amendment be set aside and the vote on it occur in the order in which the amendments were discussed in the Chamber this morning. Of course, the Senator's right to move to table would not be affected by such a unanimous consent request.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, further reserving the right to object, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. What is the order in which amendments will be voted on and what rule provides that order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will recur before the Senate in the order in which they were set aside.

Mr. JAVITS. In the order in which they were set aside. As I recall it, the first amendment set aside was the Aborezk amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is right.

Mr. JAVITS. That will be the first amendment voted on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. Notwithstanding that the pending business is the amendment of Senator HELMS or the one described?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment would have to be set aside prior to a vote on the Abourezk amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. And then the votes preceding beginning with the Abourezk amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. I appreciate that.

I have no objection.

Mr. HEINZ. No objection.

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HELMS. Is the Senator from North Carolina correct in his recollection that he has two amendments on which the yeas and nays have not been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the yeas and nays be obtained on both of those amendments en bloc.

I ask for the yeas and nays for both amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator's requests?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I make such a request now.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Before we act further, that means there will be separate votes, not one vote, does it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. HELMS. I now ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

AMENDMENT NO. 3390

Mr. CHURCH. Madam President, this amendment has been debated at some length today and if Senators are not disposed to debate it further, I will make a tabling motion within the next few minutes. Before doing so, however, I want to stress that the difficulty the floor managers have with the proposed amendment has as much to do with the way it is written as with any other objection we have raised to it.

I call attention to the fact that if this amendment were to be adopted in its present form it would require the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to direct the U.S. Executive Director of the International Monetary Fund to vote against the extension of any loan or any IMF transaction which would contribute to the deprivation of basic human needs.

Then, Madam President, if you read further you find that basic human needs appear to relate, under section (c) of the amendment, first, to an adequate supply of food with sufficient nutritional value to avoid the debilitating effects of malnutrition; second, to shelter and clothing; third, to public services, including health care, education, clean water, energy resources, and transportation; and, fourth, to productive employment that provides a reasonable and adequate wage.

Madam President, it is hard for me to visualize any condition that the IMF might impose upon a country in acute economic distress—a country in such serious balance of payments deficit that it cannot obtain additional credit from normal sources, a country that is bordering upon bankruptcy, a country in which, in most instances, the economy is entirely out of control—to bring that economy back into balance, that will not require some stringent belt tightening.

It is for this purpose that the IMF was created.

Conditions of austerity normally required to bring an economy back into balance often contain some provision that may mean that the people of the country are going to suffer privations.

Those privations may, in turn, lead to new economic stability, a new basis on which a higher living standard can later be achieved.

But if we are to amend this bill in such a way as to require the Executive Director, representing the United States at the IMF, to vote against any austerity plan, any conditionality that might adversely affect an adequate supply of food with sufficient nutritional value to avoid the debilitating effects of malnutrition, or the availability of shelter and clothing, or public services, including health care, education, clean water, energy resources, and transportation, or productive employment that provides a reasonable and adequate wage then, it seems to me, we might just as well throw in the towel.

There is nothing wrong with the hearts of those who sponsor this amendment. All of us applaud the objectives that they seek in this world. But they would require us to vote at the IMF in ways that would directly impede what the IMF is set up to do. For its purpose is to help countries undertake rescue operations in extreme situations where these countries otherwise would go totally bankrupt.

It may be that there are some economists somewhere, Madam President, who have a prescription for this condition that does not require severe belt-tightening and a period of austerity. But if they exist, they have yet to show themselves. I know of no prescription that any economist would subscribe to, that could magically rescue a country in such distress without imposing austere, stringent conditions upon the spending habits of that country. This is in the very definition of bringing the accounts back into balance again, reestablishing the country's credit, and regaining the ground upon which solid economic growth could again be achieved.

So, Madam President, these conditions imposed by the Fund—although they often require a great deal of discipline and belt-tightening—do, in the long run, lead to the restoration of sound economic conditions under which all of the objectives cited in the amendment can be realized.

Mr. McCLURE. Madam President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the Senator from New York for a unanimous-consent.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I think that came from the Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE).

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to Senator McCLURE.

Mr. McCLURE. I ask unanimous consent that Jim Streeter, of my staff, have the privileges of the floor during all stages of the debate on this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I do hope the Senator will yield to me for a minute or two.

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. Abourezk addressed the Chair.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I think I have been yielded to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. ABOUREZK. He was about to give up the floor and I am seeking recognition.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, he just yielded to me. That is not giving up the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. ABOUREZK. One Senator cannot yield the floor to another. He has to yield the floor. The Chair, I think, if I am not mistaken, must recognize the Senator.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I ask the Senator to yield for a question.

Is it not a fact that two points deserve to be emphasized in this particular debate which are pertinent: My first question, therefore, is based on the fact that the other body just took a vote the other day on the Harkin amendment which sought to put exactly, almost exactly, the same kind of a so-called human rights amendment on the Export-Import Bank bill. The amendment was rejected 286 to 103, because it simply did not belong in a bill dealing with an agency involved in export financing, which is like the International Monetary Fund essentially a banking and monetary agency.

So I ask the Senator from Idaho whether or not the recent is pertinent to some action on a similar Human Rights amendment in terms of showing the views of a coordinate body on this issue.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Madam President——

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Chair keep order?

Mr. ABOUREZK. The Senator yielded for a question. Why is the Senator making a speech?

Mr. JAVITS. I insist on order, and that the Senator be ordered to take his seat. I make that point of order.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Madam President, I seek recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor and he yielded for a question.

Mr. CHURCH. Madam President, I yielded for a question, and the Senator from New York has just put that question to me. The answer to his question is yes, indeed.

[Laughter.]

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I ask the Senator if he will yield for another question.

Mr. CHURCH. I will be happy to.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, is it not a fact, that the experience of the IMF in regard to Jamaica, is a relevant experience to our consideration of this facility, especially in view of the fact that it is admitted by the Jamaican authorities that if the loan had not been made, the poor and needy of Jamaica would have indeed been much worse off?

Mr. CHURCH. The answer to the Senator's question is, that I believe Jamaica to be a highly pertinent example of how IMF conditions can contribute to stabilizing a national economy and forming the basis for its future growth.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHURCH. Madam President, after concluding my argument I will be happy to yield the floor to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, the sponsor of this amendment. I would like to mention that another reason for opposing this amendment is the mischief done when any participant in the International Moneary Fund begins to impose certain conditions upon how the deposits in that Fund are to be loaned out.

The process, of course, has been called the politicalization of an international instrumentality. We must avoid it because once we begin to lay down conditions on an international bank or the International Monetary Fund that have to do with certain political objectives of the United States—however laudatory those objectives may be—we invite other participants in the Fund to do likewise.

Remember that the Witteveen facility is the first such activity that has secured practically half of its money from the Arab countries. It used to be that the United States would put up 40 percent of the money for an international financial institution, and that the rest of the world would put up 60 percent of the money. But in the case of the Witteveen facility the United States is putting up only 17 percent of the money and the Arab countries alone are putting up nearly half. I think they should, because they have had much to do with creating the conditions of economic instability that the Witteveen facility is designed to address.

But if the United States begins to impose political conditions upon the Fund, then on what basis do we object when the Arab countries do likewise? I can think of many conditions that they might want to impose. And the European countries will, no doubt, have a basket of conditions they wish to impose, and pretty soon you will not have an International Fund at all, but rather is hobbled, fettered organization that is forced to work within conditions and limitations that will make it useless.

So, Madam President, we must resist these efforts to impose our own restrictions upon the operations of organizations that we helped design to be free from such conditions and limitations. If we fail to do that, and start down the road of conditioning our contributions to this Fund upon certain political objectives we seek to secure in the world, then we must expect that other participants in the Fund will do the same thing, and we will have effectively destroyed its usefulness.

Mr. HEINZ. Madam President, will the Senator yield for a question or two?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

Mr. HEINZ. I suspect the Senator is familiar with many of the rules of the IMF. Let me ask if the Senator is familiar with article VIII, entitled "General Obligations of Members," section 1, which states:

> In addition to the obligations assumed under other articles of this Agreement, each member undertakes the obligations set out in this Article.

And then section 2 says:

> Avoidance of restrictions on current payments.—(a) Subject to the provisions of Article VII, Section 3(b), and Article XIV, Section 2, no member shall, without the approval of the Fund, impose restrictions on the making of payments and transfers for current international transactions.

Would not that section appear to say to us that anything we do here today is, on its face, in contravention, illegal, if you will, in terms of the Bretton Woods agreement to which we are a signatory?

Mr. CHURCH. I would think so. It would appear to be in direct contradiction to the obligations we agreed to when the fund was first established.

Mr. HEINZ. I thank the Senator. I think this is a point that needs to be stressed, Mr. President, to all our colleagues: While we, on one hand, seek to bind the IMF, the fact is that we are bound by its international agreements, which we signed in good faith, and for us to adopt this amendment would be to break our good faith with the international community, and that would be not only bad policy but, as the Senator from Idaho has pointed out, would begin to make a mockery of the principles upon which the IMF has heretofore been based.

We do not want to see it politicized, and I hope we will defeat the Abourezk amendment.

Mr. CHURCH. Madam President, I want the Senator from South Dakota to understand that when I took the floor a few minutes ago, I thought the debate on the amendment had largely been completed and I rose for the purpose of making a motion to lay his amendment on the table.

I would like to inquire what the Senator has in mind in the way of time, so that we can make plans for the remainder of the day. We have about half a dozen amendments still pending that we would like to vote on.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Madam President, I do not really have any plans on time. I would like to respond to some arguments that have been made. The principal cosponsor, Senator HATFIELD, is on his way over. I am sure he would like to speak before the vote takes place.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator. With that understanding, Madam President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Madam President, I would like to correct one or two statements that have been made.

First of all, the House passed this identical amendment by voice vote. To my knowledge, there was no objection. There it was called the Harkin amendment.

We in the Senate will look somewhat foolish if we defeat an amendment that passed quite easily over on the House side. The Senate has always had the reputation of being a somewhat more progressive body than the House. I would hate to see that turned around on a human rights amendment such as this.

Comments have been made by the opponents of the amendment on Jamaica quoting a Washington Post story which could stand some correction.

I wish to read briefly from an article by Michael Moffitt entitled "Jamaica and the IMF: Another View." I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Recently, the Washington Post ran a two-part series by Art Pine on the growing power of the International Monetary Fund in the world economy and the recent Fund negotiations with the Manley government of Jamaica. While these articles were very useful in st'mulating public debate over the enhanced role of the Fund in the world economy, the explanation of the Fund's recent agreement with Jamaica is misleading in important respects.

While many Americans have probably never heard of the Internatonal Monetary Fund, the IMF is the principal issue in Jamaican politics today. Mr. Pine's casual remark that there has been "relatively little" criticism of the IMF in Jamaica simply does not square with the facts. There is widespread criticism of the conditions which the Fund attached to the May 1978 agreement with Jamaica from the left, the right, and from ordinary Jamaicans who just want to maintain their living standards. Many Jamaicans believe the Fund is a "new imperialist" which has come to tell the natives how to live. Even the conservative opposition leader Mr. Edward Seaga said recently that the Manley government should "renegotiate" the Fund agreement on more favorable terms. It is true that the oopposition Jamaica Labor Party does not usually criticize the Fund, but instead blames Jamaica's current economic crisis in the policies of the Manley government. The Jamaican Labor Party and the Bustamante Industrial Trade Union which it controls is exploiting the severity of the IMF's demands to try to force Manley to abandon the People's National Party's program for democratic socialism in Jamaica or to resign. Nonetheless many of Manley's supporters encouraged him to accept the IMF loan because, for the time being, there is no reasonable alternative.

The harsh conditions which the Fund attached to the new $220 million stand-by agreement with Jamaica have had profoundly destabilizing effects on Jamaica, both politically and economically. The improved relations with the United States under the Carter Administration have been damaged by Jamaica's difficulties with the IMF. In a recent trip to Jamaica, Under Secretary of State Richard Cooper and NSC staff economist Guy Erb gave the Jamaican government no indication that they are even thinking about alternatives to the IMF shock treatment. American Embassy officials remark smugly that "Manley got what he deserved, now that he has learned the Soviets can only support one in the Caribbean." As one Jamaican official told me, "the IMF has destabilized Jamaica more successfully since 1977 than the CIA did during the anti-Manley campaign in 1976."

Jamaica's severe economic crisis, which the Fund used to justify its harsh policy recommendations, was not caused by Manley's prolifigacy. The causes of the crisis are far more complicated and are rooted in the structure of Jamaica's dependent economy. Moreover, the IMF's proposed remedies are likely to exacerbate, rather than solve the problems.

The "continued decline in the Jamaican economy," which the Fund bemoans is not simply due to "high oil prices, falling revenues from its sugar exports and a tradition of heavy government spending," as Mr. Pine asserts. To be sure, these are contributing factors, but much of Jamaica's current debt burden and economic crisis originated in other world economic developments since 1974. The combined effects of the recession in the developed countries, weak bauxite demand, abnormally low tourism revenues, and capital flight (legal and illegal) have deprived the country of needed resources. Confidence in the future of the economy evaporated when the opposition and the CIA peddled rumors (especially during the December 1976 IMF meeting in Kingston) that Jamaica "was going communist." The increased revenues produced by the government's bauxite levy buoyed the financial situation temporarily, but by 1975 the Manley government had to choose between heavy foreign borrowing or driving the country into a depression in order to reduce import expenditures and conserve foreign exchange. For a government committed to development with equity, as Manley's government is, the 20 percent unemployment rate alone made the latter course unacceptable. In addition, 1976 was an election year and adoption of a deflationary policy would have meant political suicide for any government. That year, Jamaicans returned Michael Manley to office with the highest percentage of the vote that a Jamaican Prime Minister has ever received and gave him a mandate for broad social change in Jamaica.

Though bauxite revenues improved in 1977, the government realized it had to hold the lid on expenditures and borrow new resources just to pay off old debts. That is why Jamaica approached the IMF in June of 1977 and accepted a $78 million stand-by agreement in July. Contrary to the impression left by Mr. Pine, the Jamaican authorities recognized the need for economic austerity. The questions are still what kind of economic austerity and who bears the burden of Jamaica's adjustment to changed international economic conditions. In this respect, it is not true that, following the 1977 stand-by agreement, the Manley government made only "half-hearted" attempts to meet its conditions. For example, by restricting imports, the government brought exports and imports into balance in 1977, after several years of heavy deficits.

Mr. Pine also fails to mention the circumstances under which the Fund revoked the loans available under the 1977 agreement. The Fund had demanded a tight monetary policy, which the government complied with. When the Fund authorities conducted their regular audit in December of 1977, Jamaica exceeded the net domestic assets test by a mere 3 percent. Had the Fund conducted its audit on another day, it is likely the government would have passed the test.

When the Fund revoked the balance of the 1977 stand-by agreement, other public and private creditors started dragging their feet on new loans to Jamaica. This worsened the foreign exchange shortage and forced Manley to come to terms with the IMF. By the Spring of 1978, the Manley government was in a much weaker bargaining position vis-a-vis the Fund that it had been in 1977. Hence the terms of the May 1978 agreement—which include holding down wage increases while prices are de-controlled, reducing government spending on social programs, and restricting the growth of the public sector—are much stiffer than those of the 1977 agreement.

A graphic illustration of this is the magnitude of devaluation the Fund demanded. In early April 1977, the Jamaican dollar exchanged at J$.90 to-US$1.00. When devaluation became inevitable to stem the flood of non-essential imports, the government adopted a two-tier exchange rate in order to shield imports of basic necessities from the inflationary impacts of the devaluation. For foods medicines, and other necessities, the old exchange rate was retained, but all other imports were subject to the new rate of J$1.25 to U.S.$1.00. During the 1978 Fund negotiations, the Fund demanded scrapping of the two-tier rate (which it had reluctantly accepted in 1977) and requested a new devaluation to the current rate of J$1.59 to U.S.$1.00. This amounts to an effective devaluation of about 72 percent in slightly more than one year.

More importantly, even a devaluation of this magnitude is unlikely to have its intended effects of reducing imports and increasing exports. According to standard monetary theory, devaluation of an overvalued currency will make imports more expensive and discourage consumption. However, Jamaica's imports of oil, inputs to the tourism industry and other goods are not very responsive to price changes; i.e. the demand is price inelastic. As Professor Arthur B. Laffer has shown, a devaluation may be inflationary without causing any reduction in imports. Moreover, the devaluation may have a mixed impact on Jamaica's export performance. The import content of Jamaica's exports is as high as 60 percent for some goods, so that the inflated costs of inputs may well negate the competitive advantages offered by the devaluation.

Much of the Fund stabilization package is a grab-bag of incentives which the private sector was unable to wring from Manley without the clout of the Fund. By limiting the power of the State Trading Corporation, for example, necessary controls over imports may slacken and importers will revert to over-invoicing imports as a way of transferring capital out of Jamaica.

What the Fund's standard package of deflation plus devaluation portends for Jamaica is a prolonged bout with stagflation, not greater economic stability. The increasing unemployment resulting from lower government expenditures and the negative distributional consequences of inflation and wage controls will rigidify income inequalities without expanding output and eliminating underlying structural imbalances. Jamaica desperately needs investment in agricultural infrastructure to increase food self-sufficiency, reduce unemployment and create demand for native consumer goods. Now Jamaica cannot even afford the fertilizer to enrich land in cultivation.

The Jamaican situation raises fundamental questions about the enhanced role of the IMF in the world economy. While the Fund denies that it dictates policies to member countries, as the world's lender of last resort, it wields considerable leverage over debt-ridden poor countries. In Jamaica, compliance with the tough IMF conditions will likely reverse the process of democratic social change set in motion by the Manley government. Many of Manley's supporters believe that this is what the IMF had in mind all along.

Though the Post opposes the human rights/human needs amendment attached to the House version of the Witteveen supplementary lending facility bill, it cannot be denied that there is a direct conflict between the new "basic needs" thrust of the World Bank's lending policies and the conservative fiscal and monetary policies the IMF is pushing in countries like Peru, Egypt and Jamaica. The United Auto Workers union has suggested that representatives of trade unions be included on IMF missions to assess the impacts of Fund stabilization programs on wage earners.

As Mr. J. Daniel O'Flaherty asks in a recent issue of Foreign Policy, does the Administration have a coherent policy toward democratic countries like Jamaica, which are trying to pursue humane paths of development? The Carter Administration's persistent silence on the issue suggests that it does not.

Mr. JAVITS. What is the publication?

Mr. ABOUREZK. I do not know what it was published in. It is a mimeographed article which was handed to me.

Now, Madam President, I read a letter this morning from the Maryknoll Fathers in Lima, Peru. It is a short letter and I would like to read it again for the benefit of other Members of the Senate who are in the Chamber at this point. The letter is dated June 23, 1978, addressed to me. It says:

DEAR SENATOR ABOUREZK: As U.S. citizens and missioners serving the people in Peru, we follow with great interest and concern the Human Rights Policy practiced by the current administration. It is our judgment that the policy has been consistent in favor of civil political rights, while ignoring social-economic rights.

We are deeply concerned with this policy. Its area of pressure for the civil-political rights is good and we support it completely. However, its lack of balance, in failing to recognize the most fundamental human rights for food, clothing and shelter is seriously negating and in fact destructive for the people of our under-developed nations.

We as missionaries here in Peru accompany our people on a day to day basis and have seen the results of what we consider this unbalanced policy: The poor (85% of the people) have moved from malnutrition to the border of starvation while being given the right to vote in the midst repression. In other words, the vote is more important than bread. We must register our strong disagreement with this policy and its effects on the poor we serve.

We write to you, Mr. Abourezk, because to a great extent the IMF is responsible for this situation. It has made demands on this Nation which are humanly impossible to meet. What nation can pay out 60% of its export earnings in one year simply to pay its debts? This policy has resulted in all food subsidies being taken away, real wages dropping over 40% in three years, and in 100 times more deaths (through disease and deprivation) than could be caused through riots or repression.

We are aware, Mr. Abourezk, that your Human Rights amendment to the Witteveen Facility is being faced with a stiff challenge in the Senate and that the administration would prefer that it not pass. Our position on your amendment is that of strong support.

We are strongly in favor of civil rights, but we consider them as valid only within the context of the full human rights that guarantee the basic necessities of life and allow the poor to live with some sense of personal human dignity.

This letter is signed by a number of Maryknoll priests who work in Peru and by a number of other missionaries.

I have other correspondence as well. This has already been printed in the RECORD, Madam President.

If I might try to conclude this part, I will say that it seems incredible to me that the distinguished managers of this legislation would oppose trying to provide only the basic human needs of poor people in developing nations. All of this talk about belt tightening, all of this talk about sacrifices that have to be made by the governments of these countries, really is not directed at sacrifices being made by the leaders of the countries which the IMF loans money to. We are talking about the poor people who cannot at this point even afford any further belt tightening. The phrase that they move from malnutrition to near starvation is an actual, real thing. It is reality. It has nothing to do with sacrificing. Leaders of those countries will still be able to buy Mercedes-Benzes. They will be able to afford gasoline for their limousines. But the poor people, under the policies imposed on them by the IMF, are not going to be able to continue to eat what little bit they have now.

I think it is encumbent upon the United States to exercise some kind of moral leadership in the area of just basic human needs.

I might say to the Senator that the confusion that is spread by the reference to section (c) of this amendment, that this has to be followed before the representative from the United States can cast his vote, is not quite accurate. The only requirement in this amendment for opposition to transactions that contribute to violations or deprivations of human needs is that any program which is developed in those countries in connection with the utilization of Fund resources cannot contribute to the deprivation of basic human needs or to the violation of basic human rights.

That is the extent of the requirement for a negative vote by the U.S. representative.

Madam President, I yield the floor at this time while waiting for my colleague, Mr. HATFIELD, to come to the Chamber.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I certainly think my record here is far from that of some callous person who does not take to heart and feel deeply the problem of the poor people in developing countries. If I thought, Madam President, that by favoring the Abourezk amendment I would be their friend, I would vote for the amendment. I would, however, not be their friend and that is why the evidence from Jamaica is so pertinent.

I asked the Senator very specifically what publication took this article of the gentleman he quoted and the Senator said it was a mimeographed copy that somebody had handed to him.

I quoted from the Washington Post and one of the 'eading economic reporters of the Washington Post, and I quoted not his opinion but his quote, that he received from Jamaican finance ministry officials who were deeply troubled about this matter.

This is what one of those officials said, a finance ministry official, in the July 24 issue of the Washington Post. By the way the Washington Post is certainly not a reactionary journal.

This is what Mr. Art Pine reported:

"To try to go it alone would have meant operating a siege economy," a finance ministry official said. "You'd virtually have to retire from international commerce, which would be next to suicide, for a country that has to import as much as we do. And that would mean serious political upheaval. There really was no choice."

Let us remember that we are talking here, Madam President, about a program of the International Monetary Fund, not a bilateral aid program of the United States or Great Britain or Germany or Japan. We in the United States give hundreds of millions of dollars away in food under Public Law 480. That is the place where these considerations pertinently and properly belong. I have supported such consideration for years and I will so long as I serve in this body.

But, Madam President, the International Monetary Fund is an aggregation of resources of many countries. We have a very heavy participation by surplus OPEC countries in the facility. Its purpose and design are totally different from those of bilateral aid programs. The design of the facility is designed to make these countries take tough businesslike decisions themselves which will bring them to fiscal and economic soundness. Jamaica and many other countries can still get from us, assistance to the poor, the needy, the sick, the lame, the halt, and the blind which we have been voting for years, ever since I was in the House of Representatives, beginning in 1947.

We have the FAO, the Food and Agriculture Organization; the World Health Organization, and many other international organizations, which deal with exactly these problems. We contribute to them munificently. The point is that we cannot apply the same principle to all international organizations.

That is what we are arguing. We are not heartless, either. We understand the situation. I know how poor Jamaica is. I stopped going there some years ago because, literally, I could not bear going through the deep pockets of poverty to some posh country club at one of the beaches. I would rather stay here and vote the best I can on what they might need.

I would not be doing them a favor if I were to vote for this amendment. On the contrary; I would make it much more difficult for them ultimately to develop a viable economic base. That is why the managers of the bill are arguing against the amendment, Madam President.

The Senator says the House passed it on a voice vote. That is a nice way to pass something over to the Senate, which has been responsible in the past in this matter, I am sure that the House was confident that the Senate would take a harder look at it. I am frankly not impressed with the fact that it was whisked through the House. I served in the House. I have seen that happen many, many times.

Mr. ABOUREZK. If the Senator will yield, a minute ago, the Senator said, when he was talking earlier, that the amendment was defeated in the House. He was not impressed then; he was not impressed when it was passed.

Mr. JAVITS. I was not conscious of saying the amendment was defeated. I was conscious of saying it was whisked through the House on a voice vote.

Mr. ABOUREZK. It was either the Senator from New York or Senator CHURCH. I cannot remember which one.

Mr. JAVITS. Well, it is good to keep us separate.

Be that as it may, Madam President, I have already given an answer "in a question" which I have already propounded to Senator CHURCH. A vote on this kind of proposition took place last week in the House, in which a similar amendment was defeated by more than two to one.

That is why, Madam President, when the motion to lay this amendment on the table is made, I hope it will be successful.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Madam President, I just want to make one more short argument.

We have given up virtually any exercise of congressional authority over foreign aid programs of this type. I think the amendment is a legitimate exercise of congressional authority. For example, in fiscal year 1976, Congress authorized only 31 percent of total U.S.-related Third World aid, or about $8 billion out of a total of $25 billion. I think it is time, and this is a good time to do it, on this type of amendment, for Congress to try to restore some sort of authority over where this foreign aid money is going. I think it is essential that we not only take the moral leadership but the fiscal leadership in this respect.

I am ready to vote. I think Senator HATFIELD will be delayed too much and I am ready to vote on this.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, could the Senator allow me to straighten out one thing? A statement was made that this is foreign aid. Madam President, it is not foreign aid; this is foreign public investment. That is a very important difference.

Mr. CHURCH. Madam President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. ABOUREZK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to lay the amendment on the table. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), The Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), and the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN) are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 62, nays 27, as follows:

Mr. HEINZ. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1537

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RIEGLE). The question occurs on unprinted amendment No. 1537, by the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE). The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CHURCH obtained the floor.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wonder whether I might have 1 minute to speak on the amendment.

Mr. CHURCH. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I point out that this is not the same amendment on which we just voted. It is a very simple amendment. It simply directs the President of the United States to instruct our Nation's Executive Director to the IMF to oppose any funding to Cambodia or Uganda by the Supplemental Financing Facility.

There is precedent for this in other areas. I suggest that we do not need to extend credit to Idi Amin or those in Cambodia who have been responsible for the slaughter of about 2 million people.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, in the debate we pointed out that the amendment adopted prior, by which Congress directs the President to encourage and support international actions, including economic restrictions, to respond to conditions in Uganda, would fully subsume instructions to the IMF Executive Director, under this amendment.

Again, for the same reason that we tabled the principal amendment a minute ago, it is inadvisable to complicate our activities in this particular fund in the way which has been described in this amendment.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to table the amendment. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. So the motion to lay Mr. DOLE's amendment No. UP 1537 on the table was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote now recurs on the Dole amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered on the Dole amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been.

Mr. JAVITS. I ask unanimous consent that the request for the yeas and nays be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and the request is agreed to.

The question then is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

(Putting the question.)

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1542

(Purpose: To require an annual report to Congress concerning human rights in each country aided by the United States)

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I call up my amendment which is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1542.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following: The Bretton Woods Agreement Act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following: The Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare and submit to Congress an annual report on the observance of Human Rights in each country which is aided directly or indirectly by the United States. The term "Human Rights" includes the following principles:

Consent of the governed, as evidenced by freely contested periodic elections and the right of opposition parties to operate without hindrance;

The rule of law (freedom from government terror, especially as signified by the ability of the courts to decide against the government and the absence of imprisonment or torture for political reasons);

Individual freedom, including freedom of religion, freedom of speech, independence of the media from governmental control, freedom to choose among educational systems and occupations, freedom of movement, freedom to obtain private property and operate in the market freely, and freedom to join private organizations of choice; and

Minority rights (the right of ethnic, linguistic, religious and other groups to preserve traditional values and culture).

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, this amendment calls for a reporting by the Secretary of the Treasury, on an annual basis, of the observance of human rights in each country which is aided directly or indirectly by the United States. The amendment sets forth the standards by which that report would be made and the criteria by which that observance should be judged.

Mr. President, because the issue of human rights has become a dominant theme of American foreign policy, it is critically important that we state clearly and simply what this country believes to be the basic components of a political system that respects human rights. No political position that I can recall has enjoyed as much popular support as this renewed emphasis on morality in foreign policy. But there is a nagging fear by many that a double standard will prevail, that certain countries will be singled out for condemnation while tyranny in other—perhaps more dictatorial countries—will be condoned.

There is, I believe, justification for this fear. The U.N. Commission on Human Rights, for example, has adamantly refused to look into the heinous violations of human rights in Uganda while almost gleefully condemning the far milder violations in rightist countries. In the May 1977, issue of Commentary, Walter Laquer has written:

The real problem is that in most member states of the UN, elementary civil liberties do not exist, and, more important still, there has been little if any progress in that direction. In theory such states subscribe to principles of human freedom and civil liberties as outlined in the United Nations conventions and their own constitutions, but too often in reality the practice is oppression, persecution, and the violation of basic human rights. A new unholy alliance has come into being at the United Nations, one that has a vested interest in the denial, not the promotion, of human rights, and one that shows a great deal of solidarity in pursuit of that interest.

I do not intend, nor do I attempt, by this amendment to define the entire meaning of the term "human rights"; but it seems to me that there are some base lines from which we could judge whether human rights are being observed or whether they are being violated.

I borrowed heavily from the United Nations declaration on human rights and standards, by which Freedom House makes its observation of human rights in various countries that are recipients of our aid. They refer to four major areas:

First, the consent of the governed. Is it a freely elected government?

Second, does that government rule by law, so that the citizens of the country are free from terror? Are they subjected to police harassment or torture in the jails?

Third, the area of individual freedoms, including freedom of religion, freedom of speech, independence of the media from government control, freedom to choose among educational systems and occupations, freedom of movement, freedom to obtain private property and operate in the market freely, freedom to join private organizations of choice.

Fourth, finally, the issue of minority rights: Will minorities, ethnic minorities and others within that category, be given the opportunity to preserve their traditional values and culture?

These, I think, are basic to our understanding of the term "human rights."

I hope when the Secretary files his report he will include some other matters in addition, but I believe these are beyond dispute.

They have international recognition. They have the support of the United Nations in the Declaration Of Human Rights.

I think they at least should be included in the report filed by the Secretary.

I realize that few governments in the world today respect in actual practice these basic human rights. These standards are high, but they are not trivial. They appear in the U.N. Declaration of Human Rights and in the constitutions of most countries.

When judged by objective standards, the state of human rights is not too encouraging. The problem today is not that countries fall short of our ideals. It is that in far too many countries the goal of government is not an open, free society, but a Marxist dictatorship. My colleague, Senator MOYNIHAN, has pointed out that the newly-independent countries of the 1940's and 1950's almost unanimously tried to establish the institutions of liberal democracy. Today, the model proclaimed by country after country is totalitarianism. The fact that some of the vocabulary of freedom is still used makes it even more important that we examine the standards of freedom I have mentioned.

Consent of the governed, as evidenced by freely contested, periodic elections and the right of opposition parties to operate without hindrance or some form of broadly based power sharing, is increasingly rare. It is nonexistent in any Communist country.

The rule of law, by which I mean due process and fair trials by an independent judiciary which is able to decide against the government, is the strongest instrument for protection against arbitrary imprisonment and torture. The rule of law is the antithesis of rule by terror. This, too, must be included in any consideration of human rights.

The extent of individual freedom, including freedom of religion and the others which I have already cited, is itself a measure of how much freedom a government allows its citizens and must be emphasized in any evaluation of human rights.

Minority rights are the standards by which human rights should be measured. They are the basis of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights which was unanimously adopted.

I have no illusion about how the world is run. I know how rarely these values are heard at the United Nations.

I am aware of the effort being made to invent human rights standards by which totalitarian regimes look better than open societies. It cannot be done, except by the perverse standards which exalt life in any well run penitentiary over freedom. In jail you get free medical care, free housing, adequate food and equality.

Sometimes we concentrate so much on the imperfections in the anti-Communist countries that we forget communism is the real threat. Vladimir Bukovsky, when asked how many political prisoners there were in the Soviet Union, replied 250 million—the entire population.

Mr. President, this amendment, which I have offered with the standards which govern and would govern the report by the Secretary, is not on intrusion into the rights or the internal operation of foreign countries because this does not condition the loans to be made based upon the standards which I have outlined. It would simply provide a means by which Congress and the American people can judge whether or not the money that we are contributing is being used to further the observance of human rights or whether it is being used as a matter of fact to further enchain and enslave people.

Mr. President, this is an amendment that is critically important to the U.S. policy today. It is an identical language to that which I offered last year on the Foreign Assistance Authorization Act and on the State Department Authorization Act and in both instances the managers of the bill accepted the amendment last year. I hope that the managers of the bill will accept this amendment this year.

The conference report in those matters last year referred to another section of law rather than continuing this language, and that other section of law refers to gross violations of internationally recognized human rights. I do not know of any definition other than that which has been written into our statutes, and I think there can be arguments about what gross violations of internationally recognized human rights might be.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senate would be wise to adopt a definition, if as a matter of fact this definition is imperfect and I recognize that it is—it has some genesis in the imperfections which we have already ratified by our actions here and in the United Nations, but at least we should set up a standard. I might note that:

The Soviet bloc nations clearly expect to be the target of western criticism in connection with their dissident movements and they want to counter that with an effort to show what it considers the genuine human rights, the right to work, to free medical care, to free education and to age-old pensions are guaranteed only in the Communist countries.

That, Mr. President, was a quotation from an article that appeared in the New York Times on Thursday, April 14, 1977, written by Paul Hoffman, and it seems to me that rather than allow them to argue about their standards of human rights we should assert in our own legislation very clearly what we expect by way of an observance of human rights.

Mr. President, let me quote only very briefly from a very perceptive article that appeared in Commentary magazine in August 1977, authored by our colleague, the junior Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), and this quotation is from that article.

Unless standards of human rights are seen to be applied uniformly and neutrally to all nations regardless of the nature of their regimes or the size of their armaments, unless this is done it will quickly be seen that it is not human rights at all which are invoked when selective applications are called for, but simply arbitrary political standards dressed up in the guise of human rights.

Finally, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article by Irving Kristol, entitled "The 'Human Rights' Muddle," dated March 20, 1978, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE "HUMAN RIGHTS" MUDDLE

(By Irving Kristol)

Having pressed the "human rights" issue so vigorously during the 1976 campaign, and then having so vociferously reiterated it in the early months of his administration, President Carter is now stuck with it. Obviously, and predictably, the whole business now makes him very uncomfortable and he rather wishes it would go away.

I doubt that Mr. Carter ever gave any serious thought to what he meant by "human rights." To some degree, surely, he merely seized the issue as a way of mobilizing, in an America thirsty for self-affirmation, the latent electoral appeal of Wilsonian idealism against Henry Kissinger's version of Realpolitik. The younger and more "liberal" members of his staff, on the other hand, who believe that left-wing authoritarian regimes are by definition more "humane" than right-wing ones, saw it as offering pleasing possibilities for disrupting relations with the likes of Chile. Argentina, the Philippines, etc. It was, therefore, an issue with an ambiguous attractiveness both to anti-Communist sentiments, troubled by "detente," and to left-wing opinion. One may safely assume that it lost Mr. Carter no votes.

But the election is over; the inaugural rhetoric has been dissipated, while the serious job of conducting a foreign policy remains. And, quite suddenly, this issue of "human rights" seems to plague the administration at every turn. That it complicates our relations with our enemies is surely less important than the fact that it even more severely complicates our relations with many friendly governments. (This is so, in part, because Congress, taking the administration at its word, has demanded that the State Department publish "evaluations" of human rights in all countries which receive American military or financial assistance.) We seem to be heading toward a posture of moralistic isolationism while simultaneously being irretrievably involved in the brute actualities of world politics, i.e., power politics. No wonder the rest of the world is at a loss to figure out the relation of what we say to what we mean to what we might in fact do.

The trouble, of course, begins with that phrase and concept, "human rights." It's not that the idea behind this phrase is meaningless. On the contrary, it has too many meanings—and we have, sometimes mindlessly, sometimes with premeditation, made an incoherent jumble of them.

FOUR VERY DIFFERENT IDEAS

The concept of "human rights" really includes four very different political ideas. Not necessarily incompatible, one hastens to add, and in practice always overlapping—but nevertheless very different. I would put these four meanings of "human rights" as follows:

Human rights proper: This is the least political of the four meanings, since it applies equally to all governments, regardless of their political structure. It refers to those practices of government which, in the perspective of our Judaeo-Christian civilization, can flatly be called abominations—i.e., where questions of degree are irrelevant. Genocide, whether on a large scale or small, is such an abomination. So is torture. And so are restrictions on the right to emigrate.

Though the United States since World War II has been properly outspoken on the issue of genocide and torture, it has avoided making any fuss about the right to emigrate. The reason, to put it bluntly, was fear of offending the Soviet and other Communist governments. The Carter administration seems willing to continue this particular policy of "moral detente"—on the one moral issue which most directly affects the lives of tens of millions of people.

Civil rights: These are the rights of an individual vis-a-vis his government, and are summed up in the phrase, "the rule of law," to which even government is subject. It is important to emphasize, since we Americans have so parochial and impoverished a sense of history, that such civil rights can exist even in nonliberal or nondemocratic societies. In both Tudor England and Tsarist Russia, it was not uncommon for people to be arrested, tried—and acquitted by judge or jury. Neither Henry VIII nor Tsar Nicholas I ever presumed to think he had the kind of arbitrary power which many member governments of the United Nations exercise today as a matter of course.

Naturally, we Americans prefer to see the scope of civil rights, everywhere, defined as broadly as possible; and it would be absurd if our government did not publicly affirm this basic principle of our polity.

But, as Robert Goldwin recently emphasized, we seem to have forgotten that our own broad definition is rooted in our political and economic structure—in federalism, the separation of powers, judicial review, the diffusion of property in a private sector. In short, our civil rights derive from the theory and practice of limited government.

But our political leaders, when they come to praise civil rights in one world forum or another, do not argue in favor of limited government—perhaps because they no longer really believe in it. They always talk as if their mission is to persuade authoritarian or totalitarian governments to make a gift of civil rights to their people. Not only is this a silly and fruitless exercise; it also suggests that our leaders have quite forgotten the relation of civil rights to limited government, and seem to believe that the people's civil rights are distributed by a paternalistic government as part of a general welfare program.

Political rights: These are the rights to participate, in one degree or another, in government. Again, and properly, we Americans cherish such rights. But only if one has a kind of mystic belief in "the people" (like the "proletariat" in Marxist mythology) as a redeeming force in history will one be inclined to give political rights priority over or even equality with, civil rights or human rights proper. One person, one vote is indeed a constitutional principle by which a people may govern itself. But it is not the sole such principle, and only a dogmatist would insist that it is, everywhere and always, the best principle. Even the United States, after all, for most of its history has not been governed by this principle.

The proper extent of political rights in any nation is not something our State Department can have a meaningful opinion about. It can only be determined by the people of that nation, who will draw on their own political and cultural backgrounds in arriving at a suitable disposition of this matter. We can try to set them a good example by making our democratic republic as admirable as possible—as our Founding Fathers urged. But that's about all we can do—as our Founding Fathers recognized.

A FOOLISH DOCTRINE

Socio-economic rights: These were inscribed in the United Nations Charter, and the United States, in its folly, has duly subscribed to the principle behind them. The principle is that a welfare state is always and everywhere better than a non-welfare state; that the more comprehensive a welfare state, the better; and that the right to a broad range of government services is absolute, whether the nation can afford them or not, and whether the people want them or not. A particular and debatable version of 20th-Century liberalism is suddenly presented to us as a universal "human right." Since, at this late date, it might be difficult to repudiate this absurd principle outright, we ought to ignore it as much as possible.

These four aspects of "human rights" are more closely intertwined in the real world than I have suggested. And, taken together, they will naturally and inevitably help shape our foreign policy. Under ordinary circumstances, our closest allies will always be those nations which share our basic political values, since they will also share with us a common vision of a desirable (or even tolerable) world order. But there will also be circumstances in which considerations of strategic interest—of who is friend, who is foe, for whatever reason on whatever occasion—must enter into the making of foreign policy. It would therefore be nice if the United States were less vaguely moralistic in its pronouncements, more specifically moral when it can properly be—and, above all, more candid with itself and its citizenry as to the limited if real role which, under conditions prevailing at the moment, the pursuit of "human rights" will play in the conduct of our foreign affairs.

It would also be nice if the Carter administration would disengage itself from the double standard, whereby left-wing governments are given the benefit of every doubt as concerns "human rights," while right-wing regimes are continually indicted. Nothing could more effectively make a mockery of the whole issue.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I share fully the concern that has been expressed by the Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE) about the lively controversy in the world concerning the meaning of "freedom."

We know what we mean by "freedom." Would that the world contained more countries which could meet the standards set forth in this amendment. They constitute, in abbreviated form, a kind of restatement of our own constitutional system and bill of rights.

For example, the definition of "human rights" contained in this amendment, includes:

Consent of the governed, as evidenced by freely contested periodic elections and the right of opposition parties to operate without hindrance;

The rule of law (freedom from government terror, especially as signified by the ability of the courts to decide against the government and the absence of imprisonment or torture for political reasons);

Individual freedom, including freedom of religion, freedom of speech, independence of the media from governmental control, freedom to choose among educational systems and occupations, freedom of movement, freedom to obtain private property and operate in the market freely, and freedom to join private organizations of choice; and

Minority rights (the right of ethnic, linguistic, religious and other groups to preserve traditional values and culture).

Well, this, Mr. President, represents the optimum bundle of values that we Americans would associate with our form of freedom. I fully concur in the importance of those values because I love our kind of freedom.

But there are many countries in the world quite different from our own that spring from an entirely different tradition, from a different system of ethics and religion, from different conditions of life which obtain.

One can probably count on the fingers of two hands the number of governments in all this world that could meet these particular tests of freedom that emanate, mainly from the Anglo-Saxon tradition. Most of the world is not free at all as judged by Anglo-Saxon standards. Most people, in most places, most of the time, have lived under some form of tyranny, a condition that continues right down to the present day.

So what will it avail us to ask the Secretary of the Treasury to give us an annual listing of those governments that have received aid under this International Monetary Fund which fail to meet such exacting standards?

We now know they cannot meet them. We now know that most of the participating governments which will receive aid cannot possibly be counted among the restricted group of nations that enjoy our kind of freedom.

So I question the practicality of this amendment, or the reason for attempting to impose our standards upon a world of such diversity, where most of the people would not understand these principles, because they are consumed with getting food for their families or some crude semblance of medical care to fight pestilence and disease. To them, our form of freedom is unreal because they not only have never known it, they have no way to measure it, no conception even of being deprived of it.

So what can we achieve by adopting an amendment of this kind? It makes more sense, far more, to take the definition of human rights that has already been enacted into law, which Congress meant as a guideline for the aid we give to foreign governments. Then, if it is the will of Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury could give us a listing of governments that receive aid from this particular IMF facility each year, as the Secretary of State is now obliged to give, under the provisions of our bilateral foreign assistance program.

This definition of human rights makes a great deal more sense in terms of the actual world in which we live, a world in which freedom is often parceled out meagerly, and the major question is the extent of the deprivation, the brutality, the gross and flagrant violation of those fundamental human rights concerning which the whole world can agree.

Let me read the definition of human rights now contained in the law. It is section 116(a) of our Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended. It reads:

No assistance may be provided under this part to the government of any country which engages in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights, including torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment, prolonged detention without charges, or other flagrant denial of the right to life, liberty, and the security of a person, unless such assistance will directly benefit the needy people in such country.

Now, section 116(d) of the same act imposes upon the Secretary of State the obligation:

(d) The Secretary of State shall transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, by January 31 of each year, a full and complete report regarding—

(1) the status of internationally recognized human rights, within the meaning of subsection (a), in countries that receive assistance under this part; and

(2) the steps the Administrator has taken to alter United States programs under this part in any country because of human rights considerations.

I believe we could achieve the objective sought by the Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE) in a way consistent with action already taken by Congress, by substituting the existing definition of human rights as the basis for the reporting requirement.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will my colleague yield so we might order the yeas and nays on the amendment?

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1543

Mr. CHURCH. I would, first of all, send to the desk a substitute amendment which would incorporate this definition of human rights, and I would like to read it into the RECORD, and then I will be glad to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) proposes a substitute for the amendment of Mr. McCLURE, No. 1542, which will be numbered UP amendment number 1543, to read as follows:

The Bretton Woods Agreement Act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following. The Secretary of the Treasury, shall in consultation with the Secretary of State prepare and submit to Congress an annual report on the observance of internationally recognized human rights, as defined in Section 116(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, in each country which draws on funds made available under the Supplementary Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the substitute amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the Senator's amendment?

Mr. McCLURE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment (UP No. 1543) of the senior Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH). The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I understand what my colleague from Idaho is attempting to do in substituting the old definition rather than the new one.

I would agree with the criticism that he has raised concerning the definition in my amendment, because the old definition is imprecise. The old definition does not really say anything more than that gross violations of internationally recognized human rights shall not be tolerated.

I would agree with my colleague from Idaho that we cannot impose our standards upon other nations. My amendment does not seek to do that. My amendment simply says that these are the standards by which we judge whether or not human rights are being violated.

Would my colleague indicate that there are countries in the world where we concede that the people who are governed should not have the right to consent to that government? Would my colleague indicate that the rule of law is an improper standard for human rights in any country in the world? Does my colleague urge that individual freedoms, including freedom of religion, freedom of speech, independence of the media from government control, freedom to choose among educational systems, freedom of movement, freedom to obtain private property and operate in the market freely, and freedom to join private organizations of their choice, are irrelevant stands? Is it argued that minority rights are irrelevant in the world today?

It is suggested by my colleague from Idaho that these standards are indeed too high. Since when has the United States been afraid to hold up a high standard to the world? When has it become the American goal, the American ideal, that we dilute our concern for human rights by trying to state that we are for the achievable, and not for the ideal?

The United States, if it has stood for anything for over 200 years, has been a beacon of freedom for suppressed peoples all over the world. Are we now saying we should not hold that beacon, let us turn the light down, let us mute the cry for freedom, let us abandon our idealism at this stage because it is impractical to hold that up as a standard for the rest of the world?

Surely I recognize that other countries do not meet these standards. Everyone must recognize that. But does that mean we should not say it is a standard? Must we, because other countries are oppressing their citizens, change our own perception of the goals for mankind?

Yes, other countries have societies and political systems that are different from ours. But does that mean that we confess that our system is wrong, that the goal of freedom that has been beating in the breast of every free man in the world and every oppressed person as well is not just as vital and just as viable today as it was when the Declaration of Independence electrified the world by lighting a beacon for the rest of the world?

Mr. President, I think it would be a tragic error for this country to turn its back upon that call for freedom and adopt a watered-down version that means nothing but is expedient.

If we were trying to interest ourselves into their internal affairs, I might say that my colleague for Idaho had some basis for it. But when all we are doing is asking to set up a standard by which their conduct can be measured, it seems to me to be a tragic error that I hope the Senate will not adopt to mute that cry, to dim that light, to lose our faith in our own ideal.

I hope, Mr. President, that the substitute amendment will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATSUNAGA). The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment offered by the senior Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH). The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER), and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN) are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 30, as follows:

So Mr. CHURCH's amendment (No. UP 1543) was agreed to.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to:

Mr. CHURCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I wonder if I could have the attention of my colleague from Idaho.

Earlier today, there had been unanimous consent for a rollcall vote on the McClure amendment. In view of the outcome of this vote and the fact that a second vote would relate now to the substitute and would be a second vote on the same measure, I wonder if there would be any objection to vitiating the order for a yea-or-nay vote on the measure now pending, so that we do move then to a final vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I do that not because I intend to object, but because I want to explain to some of my colleagues that I have been wrestling in my own mind and conscience whether to ask for a rollcall on a motion to reconsider.

There are some Senators who are here now who may not have been aware that the amendment that was just turned down as a result of adopting the Church substitute was identical to that which was accepted by the Senate a year ago, and is a substantial watering down of our commitment to the standard of human rights in the world. In fact, last year, Senator Humphrey, in managing the bill on the floor of the Senate, had accepted the McClure amendment as an appropriate statement and standard for human rights. I am distressed that the Senate perhaps was unaware of the issues and that it was difficult to explain to them as they walked into the room what the issues really are.

I shall not insist upon a rollcall on the motion to reconsider in view of the hour and the temperament of this body. Nor will I object to the vacating of the yeas and nays on the McClure amendment as amended by the Church amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLURE. I am happy to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. May I say to the Senator, I have really looked at this very, very carefully. I am one of the managers of the bill and I have great conscience about these matters.

This particular Witteveen fund differs from the assistance acts that we are called upon to consider.

Second, I deeply appreciate the desire of the Senator from Idaho to spell out human rights. He spelled it out, in his view, within the terms of the Declaration of Human Rights. I have gone through the Declaration of Human Rights—to which, by the way, we are not a party in any official way. In any case, I have gone through it carefully and I do find some differences.

Mr. McCLURE. Will my colleague yield on that?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. McCLURE. I am afraid there may be some confusion between the Declaration on Human Rights and the Covenant of Human Rights. The United Nations adopted a declaration of human rights and did so by unanimous vote. The Covenant on Human Rights the United States is not a party to. I do not want to confuse the two.

Mr. JAVITS. The declaration was a declaration of the United Nations. What I meant was we are not a signatory.

For example, the Senator's amendment contained the following words:

> Freedom to obtain private property and operate in the market freely.

I think there would be grave challenge as to whether everybody could operate in the market freely in our country, considering our regulatory laws.

The Senator spoke of minority rights and the right to preserve traditional values and culture. There are all sorts of minority rights, traditional values and culture practices which may very well be inconsistent with individual human rights.

My point is not to be critical, but simply to say this to the Senator: We are going to contend with a House amendment which was incorporated in the bill and which was tabled here—to wit, the Abourezk amendment. We are going to deal with the amendment of Senator CHURCH which followed the pattern that we have in the foreign assistance bill. Personally, and strictly speaking for myself, I shall do my utmost in the resolution of that problem to be creative, to consult with the Senator from Idaho, and to hope to work out some specificity which will be consonant with the operation of this particular facility and, at the same time, do all I can to advance the proposition made to us by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from New York for his statement and for his promise to help, which I know that he will do, as his word is always good, on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere. I just comment that the right to own property and participate freely in a free enterprise system, in a free market, may not be fully and wholly achieved everywhere, but I hope the United States has not abandoned that as a standard, and an appropriate standard, of the freedom of human beings.

With respect to some of the other standards that are set forth here, I think there is no doubt that they are tough standards to meet, but they are the kind of idealistic goals that this country has always held high. I see no reason to abandon those goals now on the altar of expediency in international economics.

I might just mention that, with regard to the right of ethnic minorities to maintain their own culture, I was yesterday in Boise, Idaho, at a Basque picnic. There is a very strong desire on their part to maintain their own identity. Something I know my colleague from Idaho shares with me is the pride that we have in the Basque people and their willingness to continue to express their own culture in their own ways and with their own songs and dances and the exposition of the Basque flag, which they do.

There will be another such picnic in Mountain Home, Idaho, 1 week later, on next Sunday, where another group, and many of the same ones, will again be saying:

We as an ethnic minority have a right to maintain our identity.

That is not something we have abandoned. That is something we cherish, even though it may not be observed everywhere in the world.

Certainly, we are all aware of the struggles that the Basque people have had against oppression within Spain. We have said repeatedly, in this body and elsewhere, that those people have a right to maintain their own identity. Here we are, on the floor of the Senate, saying that is no longer a goal of the United States. I hope the world will not look at this action here today as being the final statement on the concern of the U.S. Senate for the ethnic minorities throughout the world.

Mr. President, I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The yeas and nays are vacated.

The question now occurs on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Idaho, as amended by the substitute amendment offered by the senior Senator from Idaho.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JAVITS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1544

(Purpose: To require a balanced budget beginning with fiscal year 1981)

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

I might say that I plan to speak for only a minute or two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1544:

At the end of the bill, add a new section:

"Section — . Beginning with Fiscal year 1981, the total budget outlays of the Federal government shall not exceed its receipts."

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I will take just a moment.

This amendment would mandate a balanced budget beginning in fiscal year 1981.

During his campaign for the presidency, President Carter promised the American people a balanced budget by 1981.

If this amendment is adopted, it would be a matter of record on the part of the Senate for a balanced budget beginning in the fiscal year 1981.

I am prompted to offer this amendment, because of the official Government reports last week that our country now has double-digit inflation.

I am convinced we will not get the cost of living under control until we get the cost of Government under control. Our Nation has been operating on deficit financing now for many years. We have had only two balanced budgets in 20 years.

I think it is time to get back to a balanced budget. This proposal does not mandate a balanced budget for fiscal 1979, nor even for fiscal 1980.

It does mandate a balanced budget beginning with fiscal year 1981.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to UP amendment No. 1544 of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr.). The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER), and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) are necessarily absent.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN) are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 28, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 270 Leg.]

So UP amendment No. 1544 of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) was agreed to.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HELMS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) and the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) be added as cosponsors of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I know of no further amendments, and I presume we can now go to third reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, this will be the last rollcall vote for the day.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H.R. 9214, Calendar No. 582.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 9214) to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to authorize the United States to participate in the Supplementary Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I move to strike all after the enacting clause and substitute the text of S. 2152 as amended by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), and the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS) would vote "nay."

So the bill (H.R. 9214) was passed, as follows:

That the Bretton Woods Agreements Act (22 U.S.C. 286–286k–2) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 28. (a) For the purpose of participation of the United States in the Supplementary Financing Facility (hereinafter referred to as the 'facility') established by the decision numbered 5508–(77/127) of the Executive Directors of the Fund, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make resources available as provided in the decision numbered 5509–(77/127) of the Fund, in an amount not to exceed the equivalent of 1,450 million Special Drawing Rights.

"(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall account, through the fund established by section 10 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 (31 U.S.C. 822a), for any adjustment in the value of monetary assets held by the United States in respect of United States participation in the facility.

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, the authority of the Secretary to enter into agreements making resources available under this section shall be limited to such amounts as are appropriated in advance in appropriation Acts. Effective October 1, 1978, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Treasury, without fiscal year limitation, such sums as are necessary to carry out subsection (a) of this section, but not to exceed an amount of dollars equivalent to 1,450 million Special Drawing Rights.".

SEC. 2. (a) Section 3(c) of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act (22 U.S.C. 286a(c)) is redesignated as section 3(c)(1) and amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) The United States executive director of the Fund shall not be compensated by the Fund at a rate in excess of the rate provided for an individual occupying a position at level IV of the Executive Schedule under section 5315 of title 5, United States Code. The United States alternate executive director of the Fund shall not be compensated by the Fund at a rate in excess of the rate provided for an individual occupying a position at level V of the Executive Schedule under section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

"(3) The Secretary of the Treasury shall instruct the United States executive director of the Fund to present to the Fund's Executive Board a comprehensive set of proposals, consistent with maintaining high levels of competence of Fund personnel and consistent with the Articles of Agreement, with the objective of assuring that salaries and other compensation accorded Fund employees do not exceed those received by persons filling similar levels of responsibility within national government service or private industry. The Secretary shall report these proposals together with any measures adopted by the Fund's Executive Board to the Congress prior to February 1, 1979.".

(b) Upon entry into force of the amendment to the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund approved in Resolution Numbered 31–4 of the Board of Governors of the Fund, section 3(c) of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, as amended by subsection (a), shall be redesignated as section 3(d) of such Act, and the text of section 3(d)(1) of such Act shall be amended to read as provided in section 2(2) of Public Law 94–564.

SEC. 3. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the Government of Uganda, under the regime of General Idi Amin, has committed genocide against Ugandans;

(2) the United States maintains substantial trade with the Republic of Uganda; and

(3) the relationship of the United States with Uganda is unique and justifies an exceptional response by the United States to the actions of the Government of Uganda.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that the Government of the United States should take steps to disassociate itself from any foreign government which engages in the international crime of genocide.

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, after date of enactment of this section, no corporation, institution, group or individual may import, directly or indirectly, into the United States or its territories or possessions any article grown, produced, or manufactured in Uganda until the President determines and certifies to the Congress that the Government of Uganda is no longer committing a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights.

(d) Section 4 of the Export Administration Act of 1969 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(m) No article, material, or supply, including technical data or other information, other than cereal grains and additional food products, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States or exported by any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, may be exported to Uganda until the President determines and certifies to the Congress that the Government of Uganda is no longer committing a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights.".

(e) The Congress directs the President to encourage and support international actions, including economic restrictions, to respond to conditions in the Republic of Uganda.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury shall instruct the Executive Director of the United States to the International Monetary Fund to oppose any extension of financial or technical assistance by the Supplemental Financing Facility or by any other agency or facility of such Fund to any country the government of which—

(1) permits entry into the territory of such country to any person who has committed an act of international terrorism, including any act of aircraft hijacking, or otherwise supports, encourages, or harbors such person; or

(2) fails to take appropriate measures to prevent any such person from committing any such act outside the territory of such country.

SEC. 5. The President of the United States shall instruct the Executive Director of the United States to the International Monetary Fund to oppose any extension of financial or technical assistance by the Supplemental Financing Facility or by any other agency or facility of such Fund to the Democratic Kampuchea (Cambodia) or the Republic of Uganda, until the President of the United States determines and certifies to the Congress of the United States that Cambodia or Uganda, as the case may be, is in compliance with internationally recognized human rights.

SEC. 6. The Bretton Woods Agreements Act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The Secretary of the Treasury, shall in consultation with the Secretary of State prepare and submit to Congress an annual report on the observance of internationally recognized human rights, as defined in section 116(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, in each country which draws on funds made available under the Supplementary Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund.".

SEC. 7. Beginning with fiscal year 1981, the total budget outlays of the Federal Government shall not exceed its receipts.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. JAVITS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 2152 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of the Senate amendments to H.R. 9214.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me briefly, I would like to thank very much the staff—Jacques Gorlin, Barry Johnson, Karin Lissakers, Janice O'Connell and Robert Russell—who worked very hard on this bill on our side and on Senator CHURCH's side, and to express my appreciation for the cooperation of Senators HEINZ and STEVENSON, and Senator CHURCH for his always intelligent and active cooperation in getting what I consider to be a very important measure passed.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, it is a pleasure to work with the distinguished and able Senator from New York in all matters but, particularly, to work with him in the management of a bill of this importance on the Senate floor.

I join him in extending congratulations to the members of the staff who have worked on both sides of the aisle, to the members of the committee staff who served the entire committee so well, and to Senator STEVENSON and Senator HEINZ for their valuable assistance throughout the debate.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. HEINZ. I would simply like to respond on behalf of Senator STEVENSON and myself, who have enjoyed the privilege of working with Senator CHURCH, the chairman, and Senator JAVITS, the ranking member, on this issue, both from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I think the committee working together has produced a balanced and excellent project. I am sure Senator JAVITS views this as a very important piece of legislation, one on which he has been working as early as 1977 to insure passage thereof.

I also want to commend Senator CHURCH, the chairman of the committee, as well as my chairman on the International Finance Subcommittee, Senator STEVENSON, for the leadership they have shown in all these matters.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator very much for his generous remarks.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, before yielding to my distinguished colleague, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business and that Senators be allowed to speak for up to 10 minutes.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. CURTIS (for himself, Mr. ROTH, Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR., Mr. GOLDWATER, and Mr. MCCLURE):

S. 3355. A bill to provide for an advisory referendum with respect to a balanced Federal budget; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

(The remarks of Mr. CURTIS when he introduced the bill appear elsewhere in today's proceedings.)

By Mr. LUGAR:

S. 3356. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide tax relief to small business; to the Committee on Finance.

SMALL BUSINESS TAX RELIEF ACT OF 1978

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce S. 3356, the Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978. This bill is the companion legislation to H.R. 10540, which has been introduced in the House by Congressman RICHARD SCHULZE, a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee.

S. 3356 addresses six critical tax issues facing the small business sector. The importance of small business in American life is easily and often forgotten by Federal policymakers who design policies with which large corporations can contend, but which create enormous difficulties for small businesses.

The Internal Revenue Code exemplifies this situation. As the compilation of congressional tax policy, the code places overbearing financial and administrative burdens on small businesses.

Internal Revenue Service data show that in 1974 there were 1,978,059 corporations, and a total of nearly 14 million U.S. business enterprises. About 2,500 of these corporations are listed on stock exchanges, and the stock of approximately 2,500 more was traded over the counter on a national basis.

Most of these corporations, partnerships, and sole proprietorships could be classified as small business. The definition of small business varies with the context in which it is discussed. The corporate surtax exemption represents an effort by the Congress to define small business according to the level of taxable income. The most recent restructuring of the surtax exemption occurred in 1975 in the Tax Reduction Act of that year. For taxable years 1975 through 1978, Congress imposed a tax of 20 percent on taxable income up to $25,000 and 22 percent on taxable income between $25,000 and $50,000. Above $50,000 the 26-percent surtax is added to the 22 percent for a total corporate tax of 48 percent. Unless Congress acts this year, the surtax exemption will occur on taxable income above $25,000.

As a fundamental part of the economic scene, small business in this country shares in our capital investment shortage. The United States is rapidly losing its competitive advantage in world markets. We lag behind most developed nations in both capital investment and productivity growth.

The average annual rate of real economic growth during the decade of the 1960's for the 20 OECD nations ranged from a high of 11.1 percent in Japan to a median of about 5 percent for Australia, the Netherlands, and Norway, to a low of 2.8 percent for the United Kingdom. The United States during this time experienced an average growth rate of only 4 percent a year—17th among the 20 nations.

Capital investment influences economic growth more than any other single factor. The United States retains a position of economic leadership because it has enjoyed an adequate combination of several economic variables along with political stability and improving social mobility. However, a quick examination of the relative rate of capital investment in this country during the 1960's will illustrate that our present economic position is in jeopardy. The gap has increased between the U.S. level of investment, measured as a share of national output, and the commitment of other leading industrial nations. Treasury Department figures indicate that total U.S. fixed investment as a share of national output during the period 1960 through 1973 was 17.5 percent which ranks the United States last among a group of 11 major industrial nations. Our investment rate was 7.2 percentage points below the average commitment of the entire group:

[1] OECD concepts of investment and national products. The OECD concept includes nondefense Government outlays for machinery and equipment in the private investment total which required special adjustment in the U.S. national accounts for comparability. National output is defined in this study as "gross domestic product," rather than the more familiar measure of gross national product, to conform with OECD definitions.

Prof. Paul W. McCracken, former Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, has estimated that the amount of nonresidential capital formation per person during the 1970's is 22 percent below the level reported in the decade of 1956 to 1965. It is true that the United States still maintains a considerably higher capital-to-labor ratio than does Europe or Japan. However, our advantage has deteriorated as other nations have increased their capital investments per worker. The Commerce Department estimates that since 1960 the existing base of plant and equipment assets has nearly doubled in France and Germany and more than tripled in Japan. The United States experienced an increase of no more than 50 percent during the same period:

GROSS NONRESIDENTIAL FIXED INVESTMENT PER PERSON ADDED TO CIVILIAN LABOR FORCE (IN 1958 DOLLARS)

| Period: | Amount |
|---|---|
| 1956–60 | $49,500 |
| 1961–65 | 55,300 |
| 1966–70 | 46,400 |

*Estimate based on incomplete data for 1974.

The Congress and the administration must directly and forcefully change the attitudes and policies toward investment which have developed over a period of years if adequate amounts of capital are to be invested in this country over the next decade. This investment in our Nation's future economic vitality requires action in a variety of areas, particularly through amendments to the Internal Revenue Code.

The small business community has particular tax problems. S. 3356 addresses six specific tax problem areas for small business entities.

First. It permits sole proprietors with gross receipts of less than $1 million to elect either the cash or accrual method of reporting income.

Second. It increases the corporate surtax exemption from the present $50,000 to $150,000 and reduces the overall corporate tax rate from the present 48 to 40 percent over a 4-year period as indicated below:

PRESENT LAW

[In percent]

| Taxable income: | Rate of tax |
|---|---|
| $0–$25,000 | 20 |
| $25,001–$50,000 | 22 |
| $50,000– | 48 |

SMALL BUSINESS TAX RELIEF ACT OF 1978

[In percent]

| | Rate of tax | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | 1st year | 2d year | 3d year | 4th year | 5th year |
| Taxable income: | | | | | |
| $0–$50,000 | 20 | 18 | 16 | 15 | 14 |
| $50,000–$150,000 | 22 | 20 | 18 | 17 | 16 |
| $150,000 | 48 | 46 | 44 | 42 | 40 |

Third. It provides for the tax-free rollover of the profits realized on the sale of a small business by an individual under age 55 if all of the profits from the sale are reinvested in another small business within 18 months. Taxpayers age 55 or over may elect either the normal capital gain treatment or the 10-year income averaging treatment under section 402(e)(1).

Fourth. It provides for the rapid amortization within 36 months of certain changes or improvements to plant and equipment which are required by Federal law or regulation. The aim of this provision is to give a rapid writeoff to businesses forced to comply with Federal laws or regulations such as pollution control, OSHA, HEW rules for the handicapped, and so forth. To qualify for rapid amortization, such changes would have to be certified by the particular Federal agency as being in compliance with the law and of a type which does not significantly increase output or capacity. The provision would not apply to new facilities.

Fifth. It increases the amount of additional first-year depreciation which may be deducted from the present $10,000 to $25,000.

Sixth. It grants a 15-percent investment tax credit to a business which expands or relocates within a 50-mile radius of its present location. The increased tax credit would apply only to the first $3 million of qualifying expenditures including the cost of buildings.

Section 6 grants a 15-percent investment tax credit to those businesses which modernize or expand their facilities or which relocate within 50 miles of their existing place of business. The credit would be limited to the first $3 million of qualifying expenditures per year and would extend for a period of 10 years. In short, for each $1 million of qualified expenditures, a corporation could credit $150,000 against its final income tax liability with a maximum credit of $450,000 if $3 million had been spent during the year. Existing law would also be changed to allow the credit to apply to the cost of a building and its structural components including any plant or facility which is used by the taxpayer in a trade or business of manufacturing or producing goods.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of S. 3356 be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3356

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; AMENDMENT OF 1954 CODE.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978".

(b) AMENDMENT OF 1954 CODE.—Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

SEC. 2. OPTIONAL CASH METHOD OF ACCOUNTING FOR TAXPAYERS OPERATING AS A SOLE PROPRIETOR.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Section 446 (relating to general rule for methods of accounting) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) OPTIONAL CASH METHOD.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—An individual who owns the entire interest in an unincorporated trade or business may elect to compute taxable income from such trade or business—

"(A) under the cash receipts and disbursements method, and

"(B) without any requirement to use inventories under section 471.

"(2) GROSS RECEIPTS LIMITATION.—Paragraph (1) shall not apply for any taxable year with respect to any unincorporated trade or business if for any prior taxable year the gross receipts from such trade or business exceeded $1,000,000.

"(3) ELECTION.—An election under paragraph (1) may be made by the taxpayer with respect to any trade or business without the consent of the Secretary—

"(A) for the taxpayer's first taxable year which begins after the date of the enactment of the Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978, or

"(B) for during the first taxable year during which the taxpayer owns the entire interest in such trade or business.

"(4) SPECIAL RULE FOR MARRIED INDIVIDUALS.—For purposes of this subsection, any interest in an unincorporated trade or business owned by a husband and wife as joint tenants, tenants by the entirety, or community property shall be treated as owned by one individual."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to taxable years beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 3. REDUCTION IN CORPORATE INCOME TAX RATES.

(a) $150,000 SURTAX EXEMPTION.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (d) of section 11 (defining surtax exemption) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) SURTAX EXEMPTION.—For purposes of this subtitle, the surtax exemption for any taxable year is $150,000, except that, with respect to a corporation to which section 1561 (relating to certain multiple tax benefits in case of certain controlled corporations) applies for the taxable year, the surtax exemption for the taxable year is the amount determined under such section."

(2) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1978.

(b) REDUCTION IN CORPORATE TAX RATES FOR TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING IN 1979.—

(1) NORMAL TAX.—Subsection (b) of section 11 (relating to normal tax) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) NORMAL TAX.—The normal tax is equal to—

"(1) 20 percent of so much of the taxable income as does not exceed $50,000, plus

"(2) 22 percent of so much of the taxable income as exceed $50,000".

(2) MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANIES.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Section 821(a)(1) (relating to mutual insurance companies) is amended to read as follows:

"(1) NORMAL TAX.—A normal tax equal to the lessor of—

"(A) the sum of—

"(i) 20 percent of so much of the mutual insurance company taxable income as does not exceed $50,000, plus

"(ii) 22 percent of so much of the mutual insurance company taxable income as exceeds $50,000, or

"(B) 44 percent of the amount by which such taxable income exceeds $6,000; plus".

(B) SMALL COMPANIES.—Section 821(c)(1)(A) (relating to alternative tax for certain small companies) is amended to read as follows:

"(A) NORMAL TAX.—A normal tax equal to the lesser of—

"(i) the sum of 20 percent of so much of the taxable investment income as does not exceed $50,000, plus 20 percent of so much of the taxable investment income as exceeds $50,000, or

"(ii) 44 percent of the amount by which such taxable income exceeds $3,000, plus".

(3) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—The last sentence of section 1561(a) (relating to limitations on certain multiple tax benefits in case of certain controlled corporations) is amended by striking out "$25,000" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$50,000".

(4) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1978.

(c) REDUCTION IN CORPORATE TAX RATES FOR TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING IN 1980.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning in 1980, the following provisions are amended by striking out "20 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "18 percent" and by striking out "22 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "20 percent":

(1) Section 11(b).

(2) Section 821(a)(1).

(3) Section 821(c)(1)(A).

(d) REDUCTION IN CORPORATE TAX RATES FOR TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING IN 1981.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning in 1981, the provisions specified in subsection (c) are amended—

(1) by striking out "18 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "16 percent", and

(2) by striking out "20 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "18 percent".

(e) REDUCTION IN CORPORATE TAX RATES FOR TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING IN 1982.—

(1) NORMAL TAX.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning in 1982, the provisions specified in subsection (c) are amended—

(A) by striking out "16 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "15 percent", and

(B) by striking out "18 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "17 percent".

(2) SURTAX.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning in 1982, subsection (d) of section 11 (relating to surtax) is amended by striking out "26 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "25 percent".

(f) REDUCTION IN CORPORATE TAX RATES FOR TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING AFTER 1982.—

(1) SURTAX.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning after 1982, the provisions specified in subsection (c) are amended—

(A) by striking out "15 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "14 percent", and

(B) by striking out "17 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "16 percent".

(2) SURTAX.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning after 1982, subsection (c) of section 11 (relating to surtax) is amended by striking out "25 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "24 percent".

SEC. 4. GAIN FROM SALE OF SOLE PROPRIETORSHIP.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Part III of subchapter O of chapter 1 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 1041. GAIN FROM SALE OF UNINCORPORATED TRADE OR BUSINESS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—

"(1) SALES BEFORE TAXPAYER ATTAINS AGE 55.—If—

"(A) an individual owns the entire interest in an unincorporated trade or business, and

"(B) such individual sells or exchanges substantially all of the property used in such trade or business in one transaction, then, at the election of the taxpayer, gain realized from such sale or exchange shall be recognized only to the extent that the amount realized from such sale or exchange exceeds the cost of qualifying replacement property purchased during the 18-month period beginning on the date of such sale or exchange. An election under this paragraph shall be made at such time and in such manner as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe.

"(2) If the sale or exchange described in paragraph (1)(B) occurs after the individual attains age 55, at the election of the taxpayer, gain on such sale shall not be included in gross income but shall be taxed as ordinary income in a manner similar to that provided by Section 402(e)(1) (relating to special 10-year averaging).

"(b) QUALIFYING REPLACEMENT PROPERTY.—For purposes of subsection (a), the term 'qualifying replacement property' means any property which is used in connection with any unincorporated trade or business—

"(1) the entire interest in which is owned by the taxpayer, and

"(2) which was begun by the taxpayer after the date of the sale or exchange refered to in subsection (a)(2).

"(c) SPECIAL RULE FOR JOINTLY HELD PROPERTY.—If the entire interest in an unincorporated trade or business is held by a husband and wife as joint tenants, tenants by the entirety, or community property, then this section shall be applied as if such husband and wife were one individual who had attained an age equal to the age attained by the older of such spouses.

'(d) BASIS OF QUALIFYING REPLACEMENT PROPERTY.—To the extent gain is not recognized because subsection (a) applies, such gain shall be applied to reduce (in the order listed) the basis for determining gain or loss of the following types of qualifying replacement property—

"(1) stock in trade or other property of a kind which would properly be included in inventory if on hand at the close of the taxable year, or property held primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of trade or business;

"(2) accounts or notes receivable acquired in the ordinary course of business; or

"(3) property, used in trade or business, of a character which is subject to the allowance for depreciation provided in section 167.

"(e) ASSESSMENT OF DEFICIENCIES.—If the taxpayer has made an election under subsection (a) with respect to a sale, then notwithstanding any other provision of law or rule of law the statutory period for the assessment of any deficiency (including interest and additions to the tax) shall not expire until 3 years from the date the Secretary is notified by the taxpayer (in such manner as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe) of the purchase of qualified replacement property or the failure to timely purchase such property. Such deficiency may be assesed before the expiration of such 3-year period notwithstanding the provisions of section 6212(c) or the provisions of any other law or rule of law which would otherwise prevent such asessment."

(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Paragraph (5) of section 1245(b) (relating to exceptions and limitations) is amended—

(A) by striking out "1071 and 1081" in the paragraph heading and inserting in lieu thereof "1041, 1071, and 1081"; and

(B) by inserting "section 1041 (relating to gain from sale of unincorporated trade or business)," before "section 1071 (relating".

(2) Paragraph (5) of section 1250(d) (relating to exceptions and limitations) is amended—

(A) by striking out "1071 and 1081" in the paragraph heading and inserting in lieu thereof "1041, 1071, and 1081", and

(B) by inserting "section 1041 (relating to gain from sale of unincorporated trade or business);" before "section 1071 (relating".

(c) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for part III of subchapter O of chapter 1 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"Sec. 1041. Gain from sale of unincorporated trade or business."

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to sales or exchanges after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 5. RAPID AMORTIZATION FOR CERTAIN FEDERALLY REQUIRED EXPENDITURES.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Part VI of subchapter B of chapter 1 (relating to itemized deductions for individuals and corporations) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 192. AMORTIZATION OF CERTAIN FEDERALLY REQUIRED PROPERTY.

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—Every person, at his election, shall be entitled to a deduction with respect to the amortization of any federally required property based on a period of 36 months.

"(b) FEDERALLY REQUIRED PROPERTY.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'federally required property' means any property which—

"(A) is used on or in connection with any plant or facility which is in operation before the date of the enactment of the Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978,

"(B) is of a character subject to the allowance for depreciation,

"(C) is certified by the Federal certifying authority to the Secretary as being necessary or appropriate for the operation of such plant or facility to be in compliance with—

"(i) the requirements of any Federal law (other than the laws referred to in section 169(d)(1)(B)), or

"(ii) any State law requirements which were adopted to meet a requirement of such Federal law;

"(D) does not significantly—

"(i) increase the output or capacity, extend the useful life, or reduce the total operating costs of any property, or

"(ii) alter the nature of any manufacturing or production process, and

"(E) cannot reasonably be expected to recover over its useful life by reason of profits derived through the recovery of wastes or otherwise.

"(2) FEDERAL CERTIFYING AUTHORITY.—The term 'Federal certifying authority' means the head of the Federal agency which has the primary jurisdiction over the Federal law referred to in paragraph (1)(A)(i).

"(c) AMOUNT OF DEDUCTION.—The amortization deduction for many federally required property shall be an amount, with respect to each month of the 36-month period within the taxable year, equal to the adjusted basis of the federally required property at the end of such month divided by the number of months (including the month for which the deduction is computed) remaining in the period. Such adjusted basis at the end of the month shall be computed without regard to the amortization deduction for such month. The amortization deduction provided by this section with respect to any federally required property for any month shall be in lieu of the depreciation deduction provided by section 167 and any other amortization deduction with respect to such property for such month. The 36-month period shall begin, as to any federally required property, at the election of the taxpayer, with the month following the month in which such property was placed in service or with the succeeding taxable year.

"(d) SPECIAL RULES FOR ADJUSTED BASIS.—

"(1) For purposes of this section, the adjusted basis of any federally required property with respect to which an election has been made under subsection (e) shall not be increased for amounts chargeable to capital account for additions or improvements after the amortization period has begun.

"(2) The depreciation deduction provided by section 167 shall, notwithstanding subsection (c), be allowed with respect to the portion of the adjusted basis which is not taken into account in applying this section.

"(e) ELECTION OF AMORTIZATION.—The election of the taxpayer to take the amortization deduction, and the election to begin the 36-month period with the month following the month in which the federally required property is placed in service or with the taxable year succeeding the taxable year in which such property is placed in service, shall be made by filing with the Secretary in such manner, in such form, and within such time, as the Secretary may be regulations prescribe, a statement of such election.

"(f) TERMINATION OF ELECTION.—

"(1) BY THE TAXPAYER.—A taxpayer which has elected under subsection (e) to take the amortization deduction with respect to any federally required property may, at any time after making such election, discontinue the amortization deduction with respect to the remainder of the amortization period, such discontinuance to begin as of the beginning of any month specified by the taxpayer in a notice in writing filed with the Secretary before the beginning of such month. The depreciation deduction provided under section 167 shall be allowed, beginning with the first month as to which the amortization deduction does not apply, and the taxpayer shall not be entitled to any further amortization deduction under this section with respect to such property.

"(2) CONSTRUCTION TERMINATION.—If at any time during the amortization period any federally required property becomes property with respect to which an amortization deduction under this section is not allowable by reason of subsection (g), the taxpayer shall be deemed to have terminated under paragraph (1) his election under this section. Such termination shall be effective beginning with the month in which a lease exists which causes disallowance under subsection (g).

"(g) NONCORPORATE LESSORS.—No amortization deduction shall be allowed under this section with respect to any property of which a person which is not a corporation is the lessor. In the case of property of which a partnership is the lessor, the amortization deduction otherwise allowable under this section with respect to such property to any partner which is a corporation shall be allowed notwithstanding the preceding sentence and subsection (f)(2). For purposes of this subsection, an electing small business corporation (as defined in section 1371) shall be treated as a person which is not a corporation.

"(h) LIFE TENANT AND REMAINDERMAN.—In the case of any federally required property held by one person for life with remainder to another person, the deduction under this section shall be computed as if the life tenant were the absolute owner of the property and shall be allowable to the life tenant.

"(i) APPLICATION OF SECTION.—This section shall apply with respect to any property—

"(1) the construction, reconstruction, or erection of which is completed by the taxpayer after the date of the enactment of the Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978, or

"(2) which is acquired by the taxpayer after such date of enactment.

In applying this section to property described in paragraph (1), there shall only be taken into account that portion of the basis which is attributable to construction, reconstruction, or erection after such date of enactment.

"(j) CROSS REFERENCE.—

"For treatment of certain gain derived from the disposition of property the adjusted basis of which is determined with regard to this section, see section 1245."

(b) REDUCTION IN AMORTIZATION PERIOD FOR POLLUTION CONTROL FACILITIES.—Subsections (a) and (b) of section 169 (relating to amortization of pollution control facilities) are each amended by striking out "60" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "36".

(c) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) The table of sections for part VI of subchapter B of chapter 1 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"Sec. 192. Amortization of certain federally required property."

(2) The second sentence of section 46(c)(2) (defining applicable percentage for purposes of determining qualified investment) is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof "(or, if the taxpayer has elected an amortization deduction with respect to the property under section 192, the amortization period)."

(3) Section 642(f) (relating to amortization deductions of estates and trust) is amended by striking out "and 191" and inserting in lieu thereof "191, and 192".

(4) Section 1082(a)(2)(B) (relating to basis for determining gain or loss) is amended by striking out "or 191" and inserting in lieu thereof "191, or 192".

(5) Section 1245(a) (relating to gain from disposition of certain depreciable property) is amended by striking out "or 191" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "191, or 192".

(6) Section 1250(b)(3) (relating to depreciation adjustments) is amended by striking out "or 191" and inserting in lieu thereof "191, or 192".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to property placed in service after the date of the enactment of this Act in taxable years ending after such date.

SEC. 6. INCREASE IN ADDITIONAL FIRST-YEAR DEPRECIATION ALLOWANCE FOR SMALL BUSINESS.

(a) INCREASE IN PERCENTAGE.—Subsection (a) of section 179 (relating to additional first-year depreciation allowance for small business) is amended by striking out "20 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "25 percent".

(b) INCREASE IN DOLLAR LIMITATION.—Subsection (b) of section 179 (relating to dollar limitation) is amended—

(1) by striking out "$10,000" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$25,000", and

(2) by striking out "$20,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$50,000".

(c) ALLOWANCE OF ADDITIONAL FIRST-YEAR DEPRECIATION FOR BUILDINGS.—Paragraph (1) of section 179(d) (defining section 179 property) is amended by striking out "tangible personal property" and inserting in lieu thereof "tangible property".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 7. INCREASE IN INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT FOR CERTAIN PROPERTY.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Paragraph (2) of section 46(a) (relating to amount of credit for current taxable year) is amended to read as follows:

"(2) AMOUNT OF CREDIT.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The amount of the credit determined under this paragraph for the taxable year shall be an amount equal to the sum of the following percentages of the qualified investment (as determined under subsections (c) and (d)):

"(i) the regular percentage,

"(ii) in the case of qualified manufacturing property, the qualified manufacturing percentage, and

"(iii) the ESOP percentage.

"(B) REGULAR PERCENTAGE.—For purposes of this paragraph, the regular percentage is—

"(i) 10 percent with respect to the period beginning on January 21, 1975, and ending on December 31, 1980, or

"(ii) 7 percent with respect to the period beginning on January 1, 1981.

"(C) QUALIFIED MANUFACTURING PERCENTAGE.—For purposes of this paragraph, the qualified manufacturing percentage is—

"(i) 15 percent with respect to the period beginning on the date of the enactment of the Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978 and ending on the date 10 years after such date of enactment, or

"(ii) zero with respect to any other period.

"(D) SPECIAL RULES FOR QUALIFIED MANUFACTURING PROPERTY.—

"(i) DOLLAR LIMITATION.—The amount of qualified investment which may be taken into account under subparagraph (A)(ii) for any taxable year may not exceed $3,000,000. Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, rules similar to the rules provided by the last two sentences of section 48(c)(2)(A) and subparagraphs (B), (C), and (D) of section 48(c)(2) shall apply for purposes of the preceding sentence.

"(ii) COORDINATION WITH REGULAR PERCENTAGE.—For purposes of this paragraph, the regular percentage shall not apply to any property to which the 15-percent qualified manufacturing percentage applies under subparagraph (A)(ii).

"(E) ESOP PERCENTAGE.—For purposes of this paragraph, the ESOP percentage is—

"(i) with respect to the period beginning on January 21, 1975, and ending on December 31, 1980, 1 percent, and

"(ii) with respect to the period beginning on January 1, 1977, and ending on December 31, 1980, an additional percentage (not in excess of ½ of 1 percent) which results in an amount equal to the amount determined under section 301(e) of the Tax Reduction Act of 1975.

This subparagraph shall apply to a corporation only if it meets the requirements of section 301(d) of the Tax Reduction Act of 1975 and only if it elects (at such time, in such form, and in such manner as the Secretary prescribes) to have this subparagraph apply."

(b) DEFINITIONS AND TRANSITIONAL RULES.—Section 48 (relating to definitions and special rules) is amended by redesignating subsection (l) as subsection (n) and by inserting after subsection (k) the following new subsections:

"(l) QUALIFIED MANUFACTURING PROPERTY.—

"(1) ALLOWANCE OF CREDIT FOR BUILDING.—For the period beginning on the date of the enactment of the Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978 and ending on the date 10 years after such date of enactment, in the case of qualified manufacturing property, subsection (a)(1)(B) shall be applied by disregarding the phrase '(not including a building and its structural components)'.

"(2) QUALIFIED MANUFACTURING PROPERTY.—For purposes of this subpart—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'qualified manufacturing property' means—

"(i) any qualified manufacturing facilty, and

"(ii) any machinery or equipment placed in service by the taxpayer on or in connection with a qualified manufacturing facility.

"(B) QUALIFIED MANUFACTURING FACILITY.—The term 'qualified manufacturing facility' means any plant or facility which is used by the taxpayer in a trade or business of manufacturing or producing goods and—

"(i) which is, on the date of the enactment of the Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978, owned by the taxpayer and used by him in such a trade or business, and on such date had been so owned and used by him for at least 1 year; or

"(ii) which is located within 50 miles of a plant or facility described in clause (i).

Such term does not include any plant or facility used predominantly in a trade or business described in section 46(c)(3)(B).

"(C) SPECIAL RULE.—For purposes of subparagraph (B)—

"(i) members of the same affiliated group of corporations (as defined in section 1504(a)) which file a consolidated return for the first taxable year ending after the date of the enactment of the Small Business Tax Act of 1978 and for each taxable year thereafter before the taxable year, for which the credit is determined under section 46(a)(2) shall be treated as one taxpayer;

"(ii) assets acquired by the taxpayer after the date of the enactment of the Small Business Tax Act of 1978 in a transaction to which section 381(a) applies shall be treated as not owned by the taxpayer on such date.

"(m) APPLICATION OF CERTAIN TRANSITIONAL RULES.—Where the application of any provision of subsection (l) of this section or subsection (a)(2) or (c)(3) of section 46 is expressed in terms of a period, such provision shall apply only to—

"(1) property to which section 46(d) does not apply, the construction, reconstruction, or erection of which is completed by the taxpayer on or after the first day of such period, but only to the extent of the basis thereof attributable to the construction, reconstruction, or erection during such period,

"(2) property to which section 46(d) does not apply, acquired by the taxpayer during such period and placed in service by the taxpayer during such period, and

"(3) property to which section 46(d) applies, but only to the extent of the qualified investment (as determined under subsections (c) and (d) of section 46) with respect to qualified progress expenditures made during such period"

(c) RECAPTURE IN CASES OF CHANGE IN USE—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (a) of section 47 (relating to certain dispositions, etc. of section 38 property) is amended by re-designating paragraph (4) as paragraph (5) and by inserting after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4) PROPERTY CEASES TO BE QUALIFIED MANUFACTURING PROPERTY.—If during any taxable year any section 38 property taken into account as qualified manufacturing property (within the meaning of section 48(l)(2)(B)(ii)) ceases to be used on or in connection with a qualified manufacturing facility, then the tax under this chapter for such taxable year shall be increased by an amount equal to the aggregate decrease in the credits allowed under section 38 for all prior taxable years which would have resulted solely from not treating such property as qualified manufacturing property (after giving due regard to the period before such change in use). If the application of this paragraph to any property is followed by the application of paragraph (1) to such property, proper adjustment shall be made in applying paragraph (1)."

(2) TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS.—

(A) Paragraph (5) of such subsection (a) (as redesignated by paragraph (1)) is amended by striking out "paragraph (2)" and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraph (2) or (4)".

(B) Paragraph (6)(B) of such subsection (a) is amended by striking out "paragraph (4)" and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraph (5)".

(d) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Subparagraph (A) of section 46(c)(3) (relating to public utility property) is amended to read as follows:

"(A) For the period beginning on January 1, 1981, in the case of any property which is public utility property, the amount of the qualified investment shall be 4/7 of the amount determined under paragraph (1)."

(e) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years ending after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

By Mr. CHILES (for himself and Mr. HEINZ):

S. 3359. A bill to amend the act commonly known as the Miller Act to raise the dollar amount of contracts to which such act applies from $2,000 to $25,000; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation which will have a great impact on small and minority construction contractors around the country as they attempt to do business with the Government. This legislation, to increase the threshold of the Miller Act is being cosponsored by the ranking minority member of the Governmental Affairs Subcommittee on Federal Spending Practices, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ).

The subcommittee held 2 days of hearing to listen to contractors discuss their problems in doing business with the government—local, State, and Federal.

In hearings which the subcommittee held in Miami I heard contractors from my State talk about the constraints they face daily in the construction industry. Some of the problems they discussed are problems which the Government can do little about. However, there is one constraint, one problem that the Congress can address—that problem concerns itself with the bonding restrictions imposed by the Miller Act.

Presently, any construction contractor who wishes to do business with the Government must get a bond even if that job is only $2,000. The $2,000 limit was enacted in 1935 and it's still in force. Lots of other things have changed since 1935 but not the Miller Act.

In fact, when the Miller Act's $2,000 limitation was imposed, bread only cost 15 cents a loaf, the minimum wage was generally accepted at 35 cents an hour, Franklin Delano Roosevelt had been President less than 3 years and this Senator from Florida was barely 5 years old. Well, the senior Senator from Florida is more than 5 years old now but the Miller Act remains unchanged.

I had the distinct pleasure of serving on the Procurement Commission which reviewed the antiquated Government procurement laws and made several recommendations. The Commission had this to say about the Miller Act:

> The Act was enacted in 1935 and requires, in general, performance and payment bonds under any Federal contract in excess of $2,000 for the construction, alteration, or repair of any public building or public work of the United States. The Act's application is coextensive with that of the Davis-Bacon Act. It was designed to replace and correct the shortcomings of the Heard Act of 1894, a law that requires prime contractors to provide a single penal bond which served as both the performance and the payment bond.

Under the Miller Act, two separate bonds are required—a performance bond and a payment bond. The requirement for a performance bond is intended to protect the Government against failure of the contractor to complete construction work, while the payment bond is, in effect, a substitute for the protection afforded on private construction projects by a mechanics lien, a remedy not available against the Government because of the doctrine of sovereign immunity.

Although the Miller Act bonding requirements are beneficial to Federal construction procurement, the act presents a number of problems which impact the procurement process and construction costs.

In practical effect, requiring performance and payment bonds for contracts in excess of $2,000 means requiring bonds for all construction contracts—indicates that the $2,000 threshold for bonds is expensive to the Government and limits competition on small construction jobs; either because potential construction contractors will not go through the paperwork and expense of getting bonds or are unable to do so.

The number of construction contracts under $25,000 is substantial, although it represents only a fraction of the total construction expenditures; for example, in fiscal 1972 the number of actions representing military prime contract awards for construction between $10,000 and $24,000 numbered 6,095—over 44 percent of the reported construction contracts—for a value of about $94 million. The types of work involved included small projects for repair and alteration, work in remote areas such as fences and cattleguards, and rehabilitation of housing in preparation for sale.

The Miller Act, as currently written, authorizes DOD to waive the bonding requirements for cost-type contracts. Other agencies who do not have that authority must obtain such bonds or resort to other legal grounds for omitting this requirement.

DOD had exercised its waiver authority under an industry representative, from whom views were solicited by GAO, expressed the belief that the value of performance and payment bonds lies not so much in the indemnification of Government losses as in the other functions performed by the sureties. The construction industry's chief concerns appear to be the screening out of unqualified contractors and the protection of suppliers and laborers. Government agencies share these concerns and want the assistance of the surety to help to avoid a default and in taking over and completing the construction project when a default does occur. The act with respect to cost-type contracts has required that cost-type contractors obtain Miller Act "equivalent" bonds from their fixed-price subcontractors. Although these bonds are intended to provide protection equal to that under the Miller Act, they are "private bonds" and must be enforced under State law rather than the Miller Act.

Lacking the DOD waiver authority, NASA among others apply the bond requirements of the act to fixed-price subcontractors under their cost-type prime contractors. Although the Comptroller General has held that the bonds obtained from such subcontractors are Miller Act bonds, representatives of the surety industry continue to have concerns about the status of such bonds. The General Accounting Office in a report on the desirability of expanding the Government's self-insurer role in numerous phases of its activities, devoted considerable attention to the Miller Act requirements for payment and performance bonds on Government construction contracts.

The survey by GAO disclosed that the cost of the bonds was substantial and the number of defaults few. It was indicated that the deletion of the bond requirements and the acceptance of the occasional inconveniences, disruption, and expense of an uninsured default might result in a net benefit to the Government Agency.

The $2,000 limitation of the Miller Act is particularly harsh on minority contractors simply because so many of them are small contractors. In testimony before my subcommittee, Fred Law, the president of the Florida Association of Minority Contractors, had this to say about the Miller Act limitation:

> Minority contractors virtually have two strikes going against them when the Miller Act is applied. The $2,000 limit is simply too low. It (the limit) stops you from getting a foot in the door. Minorities need that foot in the door very badly.

Minority firms often face more than the ordinary barriers that majority firms have to hurdle. It is indeed a true dilemma.

Minority firms are constantly striving to gain equal access to a marketplace that in many respects is arrayed against them. A recent article in Ebony magazine noted that minorities own only about 4 percent of the Nation's businesses and control less than 1 percent of total business assets. That same report showed a gap estimated at roughly $218 billion between white and minority businesses. The gap is growing wider instead of smaller.

I would be among the first to agree that bonding requirements are necessary. The original intent of the Miller Act is laudatory. The act was passed to provide protection to the Government on construction work as well as insuring workers and suppliers with some insurance.

The intent and purpose of the act must be maintained. However, the present threshold is simply unrealistic.

When I heard testimony in Miami on the Miller Act several witnesses made these two important points:

First. State and local governments have adopted their own versions of the Miller Act, and Second. Federal contract officers have been permitted to treat many non-Miller Act contracts—that is, requiring surety bonds from the contractor, as though they were Miller Act contracts—even though there is no statutory requirement for such actions. Examples of such non-Miller Acts are janitorial services, window washing, grasscutting, timber removal and sales, kitchen police (KP), service contracts, computer software, et cetera. These are difficult to underwrite contracts; therefore, surety bond requirements for these non-Miller Act contracts are particular onerous to small contractors.

Admittedly, if the Federal Government were to take the lead as this bill does, and increase the Miller Act threshold to $25,000 it is reasonable to expect that the State and local public bodies will follow suit and amend their own "little Miller Act."

It is important Mr. President that the Congress recognize the Miller Act's impact upon the small construction contractor. True, it is difficult for many of these contractors to obtain the requisite surety bonds because these are not very profitable bonds for private sureties to underwrite—unless they write many such bonds per year for a contractor.

I would be remiss, Mr. President, if I did not acknowledge the great leadership already shown by several other organizations in this area of concern, foremost among them is AMCAP.

Further, Mr. President, the administration has gone on record supporting legislation which would raise the Miller Act threshold to $25,000.

I am also aware that the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) has been instrumental in this area and I welcome his support on this vital legislation.

I know that the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) has a statement to make. Again, I welcome his cosponsorship of this legislation.●

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I thank my colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES) for stating the case so well. I am proud to join him in cosponsoring this bill which is so long overdue. I endorse this bill because it is the necessary first step in striking out at the gross injustice perpetrated on our small and minority contractors by an outdated law.

If we are to realize our national goals to support and encourage minority businesses it is essential that the Miller Act bonding limits be raised to a realistic level. This is so important, Mr. President, that at the same time I am cosponsoring this bill, I am also submitting an amendment to increase the limit to $50,000 instead of the $25,000 contained in the bill.

The encouragement of small and minority businesses is one of the most important responsibilities the Federal Government has ever taken on. Time and again Congress has enacted measures which are designed to insure that all Americans are given the opportunity to fully participate in a great American institution—the free enterprise system. We do that because no one should be deprived through economic or social disadvantage of the benefits which that system can provide.

But as is so often the case, the Government offers with one hand what it denies with the other. At the same time the President wants to triple the amount of Government business performed by minority businesses, Government may be failing to provide the helping hand needed to take advantage of that business.

Surety bonding and construction contracts is one shocking example of this paradox. While the President wants to increase the amount of business placed with minority construction firms, he also has to enforce the Miller Act which requires that these firms post performance and payment bonds for any contract over $2,000. But, on the whole, minority firms just cannot get bonding. With one hand the Government giveth and with the other it taketh away.

What good does it do, then, to negotiate an 8(a) construction contract with a Government agency if the disadvantaged business cannot get a performance bond? What good does it do to set aside 10 percent of local public works projects? What good does it do to set aside 30 percent of the Pittsburgh convention center for minority participation? It does no good if they cannot get bonding.

There are a number of reasons why this situation exists. Some say it is because small businesses are too risky. Some say that bonding small businesses is unprofitable. I am not looking for excuses, however. I am looking for solutions.

If the Federal Government really wants to help small and minority businesses to survive in the free enterprise system, it has to provide the tools needed to compete in the open market. Erecting or maintaining barriers like the Miller Act is self-defeating. But merely tearing them down will not solve the problem.

Bonding is a fact of life. To truly succeed in the construction industry, firms must be able to get bonding. The problem then is twofold. First, how does the Miller Act restrict access to Government business on the part of small and minority contractors; and, second, what can the Federal Government do to help these same firms obtain bonding so they can compete effectively in the open market?

In a hearing held in Pennsylvania, we were told how bonding is the No. 1 deterrent prohibiting minority contractors from fully participating in the mainstream of the construction industry. We were told how the Miller Act bonding limit is a thorn in the side of both small and minority contractors because it tends to exclude them completely from participating in Government construction contracts.

For many small businesses today it is already too late to address this issue. But better late than never, we have to begin. We have to begin to understand that, in this crucial industry, we can make a real difference; and we have to start making that difference now.

The Miller Act bonding limit must be raised. That is an essential first step. But to be truly effective it must be raised to at least $50,000. That was the overwhelming conclusion of those minority contractors who have lost so much because of the $2,000 limit. A $25,000 limit just does not go far enough. Before too long the $25,000 barrier will be just as effective in excluding the small and minority contractor as the $2,000 limit is now. That is why, while I am cosponsoring this bill, I am also proposing an amendment to set the limit at $50,000.

We cannot and will not stop here, however. The real solution to the problems concerns the ability of small and minority contractors to obtain surety bonds. We will continue to explore ways of insuring that these firms are not locked out of public or private contracts because they cannot get bonding.

I do not want to see our efforts wasted. I want to see effective Government programs that nurture small businesses into strong, viable ones. I want to see that our small construction companies can succeed with the right kind of help, the help they really need.

By Mr. PERCY:

S.J. Res. 150. A joint resolution authorizing the President to proclaim the month of November 1978 as "National REACT Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL REACT MONTH

● Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I am today introducing a joint resolution requesting that the President designate the month of November 1978 as National REACT Month. This measure, originally introduced in the House by my good friend and colleague, PAUL FINDLEY, is designed to recognize the efforts of those citizens across the country who have volunteered as members of a REACT team. REACT, or Radio Emergency Associated Citizens Teams, is a volunteer organization which involves more than 200,000 Americans who, using their own CB radios, work in their local communities to insure highway safety and emergency communications. Countless lives are saved through the efforts of these citizens. Their work, which totaled an estimated 50 million volunteer man-hours this year, speeds the arrival of medical or other emergency help to the scene of an accident or natural disaster. REACT also has a formal cooperative understanding with the American Red Cross, and many REACT members have been trained by the Red Cross in emergency first aid help.

REACT, International, Inc., the nonprofit coordinating body for the local groups, is headquartered in Chicago. I am particularly proud of the numerous Illinoisans who participate in the REACT program. By providing 24-hour monitoring of the airwaves, they have been invaluable in giving warning of tornadoes and blizzards in Illinois, and in assisting law enforcement officials to speed help to accidents on Illinois highways. A National REACT Month would be a good time for all of us to recognize the fine efforts of this organization and of the many dedicated local citizen groups and their members.●

By Mr. HEINZ:

S.J. Res. 151. A joint resolution authorizing and requesting the President to designate November 11 through 17, 1978, as "Vietnam Veterans Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I am introducing a resolution calling upon the President of the United States to dedicate a week in which to honor the veterans of the Vietnam War, beginning Veterans Day, November 11, 1978 and ending November 17, 1978.

This period would be a fitting and proper tribute to those men and women who dedicated their efforts, and in many cases, their lives to the service of their country. As the only Vietnam-era veteran who has served to date in the Senate, I offer this resolution in recognition of these veterans' loyalty and bravery during those very troublesome years. This is a tribute they very rightly deserve.

Since the end of the war in Southwest Asia, the Vietnam veterans have been quietly forgotten. Their readjustment has been a slow and most difficult one because they are struggling to be accepted into a society that would rather forget this period of our history. Whatever feelings one may have about the U.S. involvement in Southeast Asia dedication rendered by those who served this country well must not be overlooked.

The Vietnam veteran, in many cases, is still faced with a high rate of unemployment and an unacceptable degree of underemployment. Although employers of Vietnam veterans are encouraged to provide adequate training and advancement opportunity, such efforts have not been successful in meeting the capability and capacity of the veteran.

Those with special health care needs must be accommodated either by available VA facilities or by private institutions and made more accessible to the veteran.

Additionally, the Vietnam veteran is encountering the hardship of an increase in the cost of education coupled with a decrease in funding available. The aid presently received by the veteran should be proportioned according to State to allow the individual to pursue an education in any part of the country—so that the quality, and not the cost, is the determining factor.

We have allowed the Vietnam veteran to struggle with these problems alone; I believe that we must now share this burden as a matter of justice and fairness. It is our obligation and duty to do all that we can to honor these veterans as we have those who served before them.

I ask my colleagues to join with me in support of this resolution for a Vietnam Veterans Week.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the text of my resolution appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 151

Whereas members of the Armed Forces of the United States who served in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam conflict performed such service under the most trying conditions because of the lack of domestic support for the conflict and because of the nature of the conflict itself;

Whereas the battlefield performance of America's soldiers, sailors, marines, and airmen during the Vietnam conflict was by all measures the equal of that of their counterparts in previous conflicts;

Whereas an adverse image has often been unfairly attached to the Vietnam veteran as an individual because of the controversial nature of the Vietnam conflict; and

Whereas the Nation has never fully expressed its gratitude to those who gave a substantial portion of their lives at their government's request and in the name of the people of the United States to serve in such conflict: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested—

(a) to issue a proclamation designating November 11 through 17, 1978, as "Vietnam Veterans Week" and calling upon the people of the United States and interested groups and organizations to observe such period with appropriate ceremonies and activities; and

(b) to initiate and coordinate appropriate ceremonies and activities within the Executive Branch for the observance of such period.

AMENDMENT NO. 3320

At the request of Mr. HELMS, the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) was added as a cosponsor of amendment No. 3320 intended to be proposed to S. 2152, a bill to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to authorize the United States to participate in the Supplementary Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 99—SUBMISSION OF A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION AUTHORIZING PRINTING

Mr. NELSON submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. CON. RES. 99

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a revised edition of the committee print of the Senate

Select Committee on Small Business entitled "Small Business and the Quality of American Life," a compilation of source material on the relationship between small business and the quality of life, 1946–78, be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document; and that there be printed twenty thousand additional copies of such document for the use of that select committee.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 100—SUBMISSION OF A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION TO ESTABLISH A JOINT COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL HEALTH POLICY

Mr. JAVITS submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

S. CON. RES. 100

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring),

SECTION 1. There is hereby established a Joint Committee on National Health Policy (hereinafter referred to as the "Joint Committee"). The Joint Committee shall be composed of 28 members. Sixteen members of the Joint Committee shall be the Chairman and Ranking Minority members of the Senate Committees on Human Resources and Finance and the Committees on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and their designees from the respective subcommittees. The remaining twelve members shall be designated six by the Speaker of the House of whom three shall be from the majority and three from the minority and six by the Vice President of whom three shall be from the majority and three from the minority.

AUTHORITY AND DUTY

SEC. 2. The Joint Committee shall make continuing studies of a national health insurance program. During each session of Congress the Joint Committee may conduct hearings of the purpose of receiving information concerning the foregoing.

LEGISLATIVE JURISDICTION

SEC. 3. (a) All bills, resolutions, and other matters in the Senate or the House of Representatives relating primarily to the creation or implementation of a national health insurance program shall be referred to the Joint Committee. The Joint Committee shall report to the Senate and the House of Representatives by bill their recommendations with respect to matters, which are referred to the Joint Committee or otherwise within the jurisdiction of the Joint Committee.

(b) Any bill, resolution, or other matter may be referred by the Joint Committee to another appropriate Committee of a matter referred to it under this subsection with such time limitations as it may deem necessary or appropriate.

CHAIRMAN

SEC. 4. Vacancies in the membership of the Joint Committee shall not affect the power of the remaining members who execute the functions of the Joint Committee, and shall be filled in the same manner as in the caes of the original selection. The Joint Committee shall select a Chairman and a Vice Chairman from among its members at the beginning of each Congress. The Vice Chairman shall act in the place of the Chairman in the absence of the Chairman. The Chairmanship shall alternate between the Senate and the House of Representatives with each Congress, and the Chairman shall be selected by the Members from that House entitled to the Chairmanship. The Vice Chairman shall be chosen from the House other than that of the Chairman by the Members of that House.

POWERS

SEC. 5. In carrying out its duties under this resolution, the Joint Committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings or investigations, to sit and act at such places and times to require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to procure printing and binding and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The Joint Committee may make such rules respecting its organization and procedures as it deems necessary, except that no measure or recommendation shall be reported from the Joint Committee unless the majority of the Committee agree. Subpoenas may be issued over the signature of the Chairman of the Joint Committee or by any member designated by him or by the Joint Committee, and may be served by such person or persons as may be designated by such Chairman or member. The Chairman of the Joint Committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. The provisions of sections 102–104 of the Revised Statutes (2 U.S.C. 192–194) shall apply in case of any failure of any witness to comply with the subpoena or to testify when summoned under authority of this section. The expenses of the Joint Committee shall be paid from the contingent funds of the Senate and the House of Representatives on an equal basis from funds appropriated for the Joint Committee. Members of the Joint Committee, and its employees and consultants, while traveling on official business for the Joint Committee, may receive either the per diem allowance authorized to be paid Members of Congress or its employes, or their actual and necessary expenses provided an itemized statement of such expenses is attached to the voucher.

STAFF AND ASSISTANTS

SEC. 6. The Joint Committee is empowered to appoint and fix the compensation of such experts, consultants, technicians, and staff employees, as it deems necessary and advisable. The Joint Committee is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and establishments of the Government.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 7. (a) The Joint Committee shall keep a complete record of all committee actions, including a record of votes on any question on which a record vote is demanded.

(b) Any Government agency shall furnish any information requested by the Joint Committee with respect to the activities or responsibilities of that agency in the field of health.

● Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on Saturday, July 29, 1978, HEW Secretary Califano announced the principles which the administration intends will guide the development of a national health insurance plan. I am pleased to see the administration take this important step. As a long-time champion of comprehensive national health insurance, the announcement of these long-awaited principles represents, to me, a significant commitment which should move us closer to the enactment of a comprehensive national health insurance plan.

Since I first came to the Congress, I have participated in the fashioning of many health bills and witnessed the growth of the Federal commitment to health care. At the same time, I have observed increasing fragmentation in committee jurisdiction relating to health policy matters as the scope and breadth of major issues warranting congressional consideration expanded. Today, as a result, certainly four committees of the Congress have some jurisdiction over some issue which in some way impacts on health policy.

This widespread fragmentation has led to lack of coordination and undue delay in the policymaking process on national health insurance. In my judgment, this whole policymaking effort is often seriously jeopardized by the jurisdictional distinctions which exist between services, financing, and regulatory issues, as most recently evidenced by this Congress' attempts to act on the administration's proposed hospital cost containment bill.

The administration expects to produce a tentative national health plan by the end of the year. Therefore, I believe the Congress should act now to overcome the obstacles associated with divided health policy jurisdiction. In this regard, Mr. President, I am proposing today an alternative which I feel represents a prudent solution to this jurisdictional problem.

The resolution which I am now submitting would establish a 28-member joint House-Senate Committee on National Health Policy. My proposal gives the committee exclusive jurisdiction over all bills, resolutions, and other matters which relate primarily to the establishment of a national health program. Sixteen of the members would be the chairmen and ranking minority members of the Senate committees on Human Resources and Finance and the House committees on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and Ways and Means and their designees from the respective health subcommittees. The remaining 12 members of the committee would be apportioned equally between the House and Senate, majority and minority, and appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, respectively.

Mr. President, while the joint committee may not solve all the problems associated with divided jurisdiction, I believe that the joint committee could serve as an effective mechanism for facilitating congressional consideration of national health insurance legislation and would serve to encourage strong congressional leadership in the development of a coordinated national health insurance policy. I urge my colleagues to act favorably on this legislation.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 530—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. RIBICOFF, from the Committee on Governmental Affairs, reported the following original resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 530

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of that Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 2640, a bill to reform the civil service laws.

Such waiver is necessary to permit consideration of S. 2640, a bill to reform the civil service system. While the bill authorizes to be appropriated such funds as may be necessary, the Congressional Budget Office estimated the cost of the bill at $13,600,000 for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978.

The President only submitted the bill to Congress on March 3, and the number of hearings required and the complexity of the subject made it impossible for the committee to report the bill before the May 15 budgetary deadline.

SENATE RESOLUTION 531—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, reported the following original resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 531

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of H.R. 11567, a bill to amend the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 to authorize appropriations for the Securities and Exchange Commission for fiscal years 1979–1981, and for other purposes. Such waiver is necessary to permit consideration of H.R. 11567.

Compliance with section 402(a) was not possible by May 15, 1978 because of the press of business within the committee and within the Senate. Because of this schedule, the committee was unable to hold hearings until May 18, 1978. The hearing record was not closed until earlier this month at which time the committee resumed its consideration of the bill.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

REHABILITATION ACT AMENDMENTS—S. 2600

AMENDMENTS NOS. 3391 THROUGH 3405

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. McCLURE submitted 15 amendments intended to be proposed by him to S. 2600, a bill to amend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 to extend certain programs established in such act, to establish a comprehensive services program for the severely handicapped, and for other purposes.

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I am today submitting 15 amendments to S. 2600, the Rehabilitation Act amendments. Fourteen of these are designed to substitute the administration's budget recommendations for those reported by committee.

The administration's figures would expand some programs and shrink or abolish others. It would limit all authorizations to 3 years, rather than the 5-year period contained in the legislation. On the whole, the President's figures would save the taxpayer several hundred million dollars.

There is not a Member of this body, Mr. President, who does not support a strong, effective, and workable program to provide assistance to the handicapped. There are many Members, myself included, who question whether money spent for construction projects, such as the placement of ramps on desolated street corners in deserted part of the city, might not better be used for projects which give more direct assistance to those whom we are trying to help. There are also those who question whether throwing more money at marginally productive solutions—in which large amounts of money go to sustain central bureaucracies—is going to really make much difference for the average handicapped person.

Perhaps we would be better served by expanding the tax exemption to include types of disabilities aside from blindness. Perhaps a greater amount of funding should go directly to handicapped people so that they can make their own decisions concerning its use. These are questions which will not be able to be considered until 1984 if the 5-year authorizations recommended by the committee are adopted.

At the very least, it seems to me that the principals on the committee should be willing to sit down with the administration to discuss these concerns and attempt to reach some mutually acceptable compromise. It is my understanding that, despite HEW's attempt to reach such an accommodation, the managers of the legislation have declined to consider its objections to the bill and continue to push for expedited passage. Said one staff member:

The Administration doesn't have a vote.

I have instructed my staff to provide whatever assistance is needed to help the parties reconcile their divergent views.

But I would caution the administration that fiscal responsibility goes beyond positing proposals for which it is not willing to work. If the President is genuinely committed to the thoughtful reprioritizing contained in his budget recommendations, he should work with the Congress for the purpose of translating his views into policy. I stand ready to help in any way I can.

REGIONAL RAIL REORGANIZATION ACT AMENDMENT OF 1978—S. 2788

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. RIBICOFF (for himself, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. WEICKER, and Mr. JAVITS) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to S. 2788, a bill to amend section 216 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to authorize the purchase of an additional $600 million of the series A preferred stock of the corporation, and for other purposes.

NOTICES OF HEARING

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE

● Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Subcommitee on Administrative Practice and Procedure of the Committee on the Judiciary, will continue hearings on the FBI Charter as follows: Tuesday, August 15, domestic security; Monday and Tuesday, August 28 and 29, information policy and NCIC; and September 14, overall policy. Hearings will begin each day at 10 a.m., in 2228 Dirksen Building.●

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE

● Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure of the Committee on the Judiciary, will have hearings on August 17, 22, and 24, 1978, on the issue of grand jury reform. The hearings will begin each day at 10 a.m., and will be in room 2228, Dirksen Building.

Anyone wishing to submit testimony for the RECORD, contact Jessica Josephson, Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure, 162 Russell Building, Washington, D.C. 20510.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE INSPIRATIONAL CAROBETH LAIRD

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, the July 30, 1978, issue of Parade carried an inspirational account of one of our most creative citizens, Carobeth Laird, an 83-year-old California author.

I submit for the RECORD the article by Rita Rooney, entitled "Carobeth Laird: An Old Woman Dreams—and Writes Books."

The article follows:

CAROBETH LAIRD: AN OLD WOMAN DREAMS—AND WRITES BOOKS

(By Rita Rooney)

SAN DIEGO, Calif.—Although she's been writing all her life, Carobeth Laird didn't become a successful author until a few weeks before her 80th birthday, when her first book, Encounter With an Angry God, was published by Malki Museum Press. Located on a reservation in Banning, Cal., the small Indian press followed shortly with The Chemehuevis, written earlier by Mrs. Laird.

The second book, a scholarly account of her husband's people, established Carobeth Laird as an authority on American Indian culture.

Today, with Encounter a popular paperback, a third book seeking a publisher and a fourth in first draft, Mrs. Laird is a women driven by a quiet sense of urgency.

"The more I live, the more I want to record what I've seen," say the 83-year-old author. "So much of what I wrote when I was younger is now scattered to the winds. I'd like to think some of it will turn up someday in an old trunk. But, of course, that's an old woman's dream. I know it's gone."

Recently, seventh-graders at the Howard T. Herber School in Malverne, N.Y., raised $612 for Mrs. Laird to fly from California to address their class. The meeting signaled a high point in a long-distance relationship that began more than a year ago.

Teacher Dorothy Lamb explains that, though her students have read some of Mrs. Laird's work, it is the woman herself who has captured their interest.

"She is the oldest person most of them have met," she says. "I think they fell in love with her when she first answered their letters. Her sense of humor and her insights are so sharp."

The friendship began when the children became curious about a photograph of a grave marker in a textbook. They wondered about the name on the marker—Thompson Porter Laird. Who was he? Did he have any living descendants?

The teacher encouraged her class to make inquiries of museums and universities in the Southwest. Finally a reply from a historian at Arizona State University put them in touch with the dead man's daugher-in-law, Carobeth Laird.

Considering Mrs. Laird's tenacity as a writer and the long, patient years of being unpublished, it might be assumed her message to young people would be "perseverance." It wasn't.

"I talked to them about growing old," she said when she returned to Poway, the rural community in San Diego's back-hill country where she now lives.

"Old age can be a splendid time, as long as one still lives in the world of the mind. Oh, it's grand if you can jog when you're 90, but it's more important to be able to think. I tried to encourage those precious children to read, to prepare their minds, to go as far as they can with understanding. Then whatever happens, even if they are deaf and in solitary confinement, they will have a resource which cannot be taken from them."

The writer is no stranger to hardship. The daughter of a Texas newspaper publisher, she first married an eccentric linguist and ethnologist, John Peabody Harrington. He introduced her to Indian life by sending her on field trips to live among obscure tribes, studying their language patterns. She remembers being alone, eight months pregnant, and sleeping on a dirt floor with an ax under her pillow—a precaution she now knows was unnecessary, but an understandable one to a girl raised on scalping stories.

After six years of marriage to Harrington, she divorced him to marry his Indian interpreter, George Laird. Though Laird died in 1940, she says, "he is still more real to me than any living being."

Carobeth Laird has known both poverty and rejection. She gave birth to eight children, suffered the loss of one. As a widow, she was left practically destitute. A few years ago, she spent some time in a nursing home, "fighting for sanity and identity." Today, she is partially crippled, unable to raise her arms or walk without aid. But she has survived through a remarkable spiritual toughening, a determination she calls The Will, and the resource that has never failed—her mind.

Although she never finished high school and has taken only one short course in creative writing, there was never a time that Mrs. Laird didn't consider herself a writer. Even as a child, she made up stories, scribbled them on paper, and gave them to her father with instructions to print them in his newspaper. As a young mother living on an Indian reservation, she devoted Sunday afternoons to perfecting her skill with words.

"On Sundays, George always took the children on an outing, and I stayed home. It was the only time I had to write," she recalls.

The young Carobeth was as passionately devoted to reading as to writing. Any subject that caught his fancy became an object of serious study even during the years when she had no money for books and the closest library was 20 miles away by dirt road. She once tried to learn Japanese from library books.

She credits the King James version of the Bible as having the most significant influenco on her writing style. Laughing, she remembers that as a child she could be "bribed" to take a daily dose of bad-tasting medicine by having her mother read from the Book of Revelations. "It wasn't a religious inclination with me," she explains. "I have always been drawn to the pure poetry of the King James version. Of course, Shakespeare has the same effect. But Shakespeare hasn't always been available to me."

Carobeth's first book, Encounter With an Angry God, which received high praise from critics, tells of her marriage to Harrington and her subsequent romance and marriage to George Laird. She's currently working on a manuscript she calls Mirror and Pattern, the mythology of the Chemehuevi Indians.

During her 20 years with George Laird, the couple spent most evenings recording tribal mythology. When he died, she couldn't bear to look at the work they had compiled together, and it lay abandoned for years. Now that she has taken it up again, she is translating her own writing style to the native idiom in an effort to preserve the spirit and personality of the Chemehuevis, as well as their myths.

NURSING HOME STORY

But it is Limbo, an account of her experience in an Arizona nursing home, that she most wants to see published.

So far, the book has been turned down by most of the major publishing houses. The primary objection seems to stem from a disbelief that anyone who had lived through such an experience could write about it with the detachment Laird projects.

"That is unfair," Carobeth says. "Don't they realize that, as a writer, I think in a detached manner?"

Looking back, she says, "I went to that nursing home with a sinking heart. But I had no choice at the time. I had nowhere else to go.

"It was neither the best nor the worst of nursing homes," she says. "It wasn't horrible, just dehumanizing."

She tells of the disheartening effect of living in a room in which the shades are always drawn, being called "dear" in a patronizing tone by employees, and being forced to choose between staying in bed all day or sitting upright in a wheelchair for eight hours at a time.

"Once the beds were made," she explains, "the staff didn't like to have them disarranged."

According to Laird, more than two-thirds of the patients in the facility were severely incapacitated mentally, as well as physically. There was no separation between these patients and those who were mentally alert. She recalls daily battles with the staff during her determined efforts to assert some degree of independence.

Did she ever win any of those battles? "Not really," she admits sadly. "If I mentioned anything about my life or my books, the aides merely humored me with their condescending 'yes dear, no dear.' There was no respect for a person's dignity."

During those days, Carobeth read whatever she could get her hands on. Not that the hospital library was equipped with the kind of literature that had always been her joy. But she read Gothic novels or anything that set her apart from her surroundings and helped her maintain the struggle for sanity. Admitted as an emergency patient, she didn't even have her Bible with her. Now she says, "I will never be without the Book of Psalms again. As soon as I got out of there, I set myself to memorizing it."

At the home, Carobeth had little contact with the outside world. Telephone calls were not permitted. Her editor, Harry Lawton, finally got through by conferring on her the title of Professor Laird and demanding she be called to the phone.

Fortunately for Carobeth, two old friends, Mickie and Ralph Michelson, took her from the nursing home to their own home in Poway—the place where she and George Laird had lived and raised their family.

STILL AT WORK

Carobeth keeps few personal possessions. Her small room at the Michelson home is filled with books—everything from Joseph Conrad to Margaret Mead. A portable typewriter sits on a modest-looking desk, and in a drawer lie 600 pages of her current manuscript, to which she devotes four hours a day. She says the Michelsons saved her life, but Mickie is quick to disagree.

"It's that will of hers," she says. "It keeps her going. She is her own salvation."

"Perhaps that's true," Carobeth admits. "At least, I know there is more I want to do, and The Will—I can't describe it except to call it that—does give me the stamina to keep plugging away."

Her goals include the publication of Limbo, the completion of her mythology and eventually the writing of her memoirs. There is none of the wild ambition of youth in Carobeth Laird. But then, according to her, there never was.

As for the possible wealth that might come from publication, she smiles slowly and says: "I have never had money. It would be nice. It would be especially good to know I won't ever be destitute. Beyond that, I would like to have a year or two of being able to do something for my friends, and I would like to have a really good library of my own."●

PROPOSALS TO STIMULATE ECONOMIC GROWTH

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, as a nation, we stand at a crossroads. One road, that traveled by Great Britain, has the immediate appeal associated with redistributing existing wealth; but it also holds in store the ultimate pain of sharing not the wealth but the resultant poverty. The other, less frequently traveled road, promises continued progress and gradual enrichment for all members of society. The course I have fought for instead of our present drift toward socialism is based on three major reforms. First, we need a permanent, across-the-board cut in taxes. Second, we must cut back excessive Federal regulations, redtape, and paperwork. Finally, we need a constitutional amendment to limit the amount of our money which the Federal Government may spend.

Since 1975, Congressman JACK KEMP and I have been fighting for passage of our Jobs Creation Act.

This bill contains five major provisions:

First, it provides a permanent reduction in individual income taxes.

Second, it allows an exclusion from gross income of qualified additional savings investment made during a tax year—an exclusion of up to $1,000 or $2,000 for a married couple filing a joint return.

Third, it eliminates the present system of double taxation of dividends by allowing a deduction for dividends paid by domestic corporations.

Fourth, it amends the corporate normal tax rate and increases the corporate surtax exemption, including provisions for reduced taxes for small business, to give an effective corporate income tax reduction in the range of 6 percent.

Fifth, it allows taxable year price adjustments in property through capital recovery allowances.

The Jobs Creation Act will do just that—create jobs in the private sector of our economy. It would eliminate the need for expanded Federal grants and loan programs by reducing unemployment and returning persons to self-sufficiency and a tax-generating rather than a tax-consuming status. It would encourage additional savings and investments by the individual, stimulate home construction, and assure an increase in real purchasing power by the work force.

Investment is the key to economic growth. A look at history gives adequate evidence of the extent to which our prosperity depends on the availability and use of private capital. For example, just 100 years ago, it took a week to produce the same amount of wheat that today can be produced with just a single hour of human labor. What did it? The steel plow, tractor, harvester, better seed, and cheap transportation. All of these in turn were made possible by the use of investment capital.

Capital is the key word. Capitalism—the use of funds to build plants and to replace equipment—has been the most important factor in raising our standard of living, and it can be the answer to a steady economic recovery and continued stable growth.

Because we have been so caught up in our ever-increasing rate of consumption, America has fallen behind in its investment rate. Investment in new plant and equipment, per person added to the labor force, in the 1970's was 22 percent less than that invested in 1956 and 1965. Our rate of capital formation was one of the lowest in the major industrialized nations. On the other hand, France and Germany have doubled their industrial capacity and Japan has tripled its capacity. America has gradually lost a competitive edge in the world market and consequently fewer jobs are available. The United States will have to provide jobs for 7 million more people in the labor force by 1980 and in addition upgrade productivity and earning power of the present labor force. An average investment of $35,000 will be needed to support each worker with plant and equipment.

Every dollar invested in capital does not necessarily go into expansion alone. Some must also be used for replacement of aging capital—at inflated prices, conversion of existing assets into similar but more technically advanced ones, or to purchase pollution abatement equipment and OSHA-mandated compulsory but nonproductive items. Those dollars which are ultimately invested in new plant and equipment are the keys to an expanding and fully employed economy.

One thing we must always remember is that people pay taxes and ultimately people bear the tax burdens of corporations. They pay direct taxes: Individual income tax, sales tax, gasoline and fuel tax, gifts and estate taxes. They pay indirectly through high prices paid for purchased goods and services. Corporation income tax, real estate, and sales taxes paid by businesses are passed on to the consumer.

In 1929, Federal, State, and local tax collections constituted only 13 percent of total national income. By 1950, it had risen to 26 percent. By 1974, it had risen to 40 percent. By 1985, total Government's share of national personal income could be 54 percent—more than half the people's earnings—if present trends are allowed to continue. These figures do not reflect the effects of inflation—the great unlegislated tax. When the Government spends money, it is spending tax dollars—hard-earned dollars of the consumer.

This same contagious "uncontrollability" has infected Government regulatory agencies as well, swelling their numbers to 80 and their bureaucratic forces to 105,000. It has been shown that regulatory agencies have often fueled inflation, stifled competition, focused on trivia while neglecting significant issues, and resulted in a loss of jobs while reducing productivity. Yet, lest they be thought ineffectual, these agencies continue frantically to pour out regulations to the tune of $130 billion a year in compliance costs.

Decades of increasing governmental regulation—controlling various aspects of the securities business, railroads, oil companies, antitrust, utilities, food and drugs, wages and hours, shipping, broadcasting, aviation, antidiscrimination, health and safety, environmental protection, energy, et cetera, have also resulted in wildly rocketing taxpayer costs and open-ended bureaucratic proliferation. Regulatory bodies at the Federal, regional, State, and local levels now number in the thousands. Due to their explosive growth and desire to perpetuate themselves, paperwork in agencies such as EPA, OSHA, IRS, and FEA has burgeoned to some 10,000 Federal forms alone.

We must now reverse the trend where every business is treated as a enemy of the State trying to circumvent its laws, rather than as its actual provider. To do so, we must eliminate regulatory overkill, by arming the public and Congress with information about present regulations, by strengthening oversight of the regulatory agencies, by measuring the cost versus benefits of new and existing regulations, and by reducing Federal report filing and recordkeeping requirement.

The time for regulatory reform has arrived. Restoring the public's confidence in our Government demands that we get the Government bureaucrat off the individual's back. Government must serve the people and not continue as a dictatorial parasite. Government can exist only on the production of the private citizen. Strangling that production is both immoral and suicidal.

Last month I introduced a constitutional spending limitation amendment to limit the amount of our tax money which the Federal Government may spend. This amendment will provide protection against oppressive taxation in the same way the Bill of Rights protects our civil liberties and political rights. Now is the time to halt the growth of government, and a constitutional limit on the spending power of government is the best way to do it.

During my 11 years of service in Congress, I have sponsored over 25 bills to reverse the tax-and-spend philosophy which dominates Washington.

These measures have not been adopted or failed to halt the growth of big government, because the beneficiaries of our tax dollars are well organized and skillful at manipulating Washington. The Congress and Federal Government have an insatiable appetite for problems-to-solve and pressure-groups-to-please. Until now, these forces have overwhelmed the ability of the average American who pays for all this to influence the course of events.

To correct this imbalance I propose that we amend the Constitution to limit Federal expenditures to one-third of the national income. The Federal Government is now spending just under 35 percent of that figure. This amendment would result in an immediate reduction of between $10 and $12 billion and more importantly it prevents Federal tax bites from becoming any larger.

I believe these proposals will unleash the productive energy of the American people and lead to the greatest period of economic growth in our history. But important as the economic effects of these proposals are, the most important benefit will be the preservation of this country as the land of the free where, as George Washington said, government is the servant, not the master of the people. No one is free if he does not own the fruits of his labor. Limiting the power of Government to spend our money is the most important issue we face. It will be the dominant political issue of the next few years. Those of us who have long fought for tax and spending limits are heartened by the recent votes in California and Tennessee. The voters of these States have shown that big government is not inevitable. It can be halted. We do have a choice.●

TRANSFER OF THE CHILD NUTRITION PROGRAMS

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, last week the American School Food Service Association (ASFSA), meeting in New Orleans for its 32d annual convention, passed unanimously a resolution urging the Senate to adopt Senator PERCY's amendment to S. 991 preventing the transfer of the child nutrition programs from the Department of Agriculture.

The association's 66,000 members are responsible for serving 27 million children every day through the national school lunch program.

ASFSA is one of the major national organizations which has worked with the Congress closely over the year, helping to expand and develop the school feeding programs. They have testified before the Congress often on this subject and their opinions are respected by the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry.

I ask that the ASFSA resolution, as well as the testimony of Senator PERCY on this subject, and a letter sent by Senators TALMADGE, DOLE, and myself to Senator RIBICOFF be printed in the RECORD. I believe that these documents explain why the members of the Agriculture Committee are strongly opposed to such a transfer even though it would not effect our committee's jurisdiction over the programs.

The material follows:

JULY 26, 1978.

Hon. GEORGE S. MCGOVERN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Nutrition, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I wanted to bring to your attention the attached Resolution passed at our 32nd Annual Convention in New Orleans, Louisiana.

I hope that this Resolution will be brought to the attention of all the Senate when it votes on S. 991.

Thank you for your very great support for our Association's position on this issue. You are a very great friend.

Sincerely yours,

MRS. GENE WHITE,
President.

RESOLUTION

Whereas the American School Food Service Association's 66,000 members are responsible for serving 27 million school children each and every day, and;

Whereas the American School Food Service Association has been the leading spokesman on behalf of the National School Lunch program for the last 30 years, and;

Whereas the National School Lunch program has been successfully administered through the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the ASFSA workers for the last 30 years, and;

Whereas during this 30-year period the program has grown tenfold, so that it now represents the most successful and largest feeding program in the world, and;

Whereas this success is directly attributable to the experience, care and interest of the USDA, the ASFSA, and the Members of the Senate Agriculture Committee, and;

Whereas the President's recommendation to transfer the national school feeding programs from USDA to the proposed Department of Education is precipitous and detrimental to this unique and successful partnership of interest which has nurtured the school feeding programs to their present level of service to America's school children, and;

Whereas this recommendation by the President preceded the completion of his own Task Force on Food and Nutrition Study of this issue, and;

Whereas the Senate Committee on Government Affairs has incorporated the President's recommendation in its legislation creating a Department of Education after having defeated an amendment to strike out this transfer by an eight-to-eight vote, and;

Whereas the ASFSA strongly supported the above-mentioned amendment;

Be it resolved that the American School Food Service Association petitions the Membership of the United States Senate to pass the Percy Amendment prohibiting the transfer of the USDA school feeding programs to the proposed Department of Education.

---

TESTIMONY OF SENATOR CHARLES H. PERCY

My amendment would strike the proposed transfer of the child nutrition programs. There are a number of sound reasons for keeping these programs in USDA.

First, a Department of Education will be dominated by educators. Educators have had a history of obstructing the placement of these programs within the schools. In testimony received by the Committee, the Food Research and Action Center, a non-profit anti-hunger advocacy center, stated that:

"A good portion of our effort has been in the area of School Lunch and School Breakfast Program expansion. Time after time we have found that state and local Boards of Education have been at best uninterested, and at worst obstructionists, in this expansion effort. FRAC and/or Legal Services attorneys have brought numerous lawsuits seeking to expand school lunch programs in local areas. These lawsuits, brought on behalf of low-income plaintiffs, resulted in the establishment of school lunch programs in Hartford, Connecticut; Bridgeport, Connecticut; Mount Vernon, New York; Cleveland, Ohio; and the State of Rhode Island, among others. In many of these areas, litigation would not have been required if state and local Boards of Education and education administrators had viewed the school food programs as integral parts of an educational environment."

FRACs testimony continues:

"In short, in the past, poor people have not been able to look to education administrators and policy makers to spearhead the need for school food programs. Instead, these administrators have often taken the position that such programs are expensive, administratively burdensome, and must take a distant backseat to other education priorities."

In addition to FRAC's testimony, The Children's Foundation testified that it is completing a study on barriers to the implementation of the school breakfast program. The study is entitled "I'd Rather Go to Hell Than Run a Breakfast Program." This was the direct quote of a local school official. It is indicative of the view that many such officials have of these programs.

Second, the transfer will jeopardize the funding of the child nutrition programs. Since educators have not generally viewed nutrition programs as a vital part of the educational process, it is reasonable to assume that a Federal Department of Education would be no more responsive to the importance of such programs. When faced with budgetary constraints, these programs will be seen as expandable. This would be particularly true of those child nutrition programs with little or no connection to school systems, such as the summer food and day care feeding programs.

Third, USDA would still keep the research support vital to these programs. USDA is increasing its research in both nutrition and agricultural economics. It would be counter-productive to remove the child nutrition programs from a Department that is presently equipped to do research in areas directly related to the improvement of these programs.

Fourth, although the Administration has pledged its continued support for the commodities aspect of these programs, this guarantee may become worthless several years down the road as the programs become dominated by educators. Moreover, we must not lose sight of one of the original reasons behind the creation of the school lunch program, which was commodity support. Instead of paying farmers not to grow crops, we are paying them for their surplus crops and using those surplus crops to feed hungry children. This is a much more efficient use of taxpayers' money. As Senator Talmadge brought to our attention,

"The school lunch program today constitutes the only effective means through which the Secretary of Agriculture can provide price and market stability to those farm commodities that do not enjoy the protection of government price support programs."

Fifth, one approach to improving the quality of meals in these programs requires training food service personnel to procure and prepare food more effectively and economically. USDA has the expertise to accomplish this and is initiating activities in this area. A Department of Education is less likely to attack such a problem or to have the expertise to do so effectively.

Sixth, the transfer is opposed by a broad spectrum of groups, including agriculture groups, child-oriented public interest groups, nutritionists, and school food administrators. This grouping includes the American School Food Service Association, which is the largest national association representing people who direct, manage, and work in school nutrition programs at the State and local level. These groups have worked the closest with and are the most knowledgeable on the child nutrition programs.

Seventh, the President's Reorganization Project is presently conducting a study of the Federal nutrition effort. This study is not scheduled to be completed until next year. As a result, the transfer of these programs at this time would be premature.

Regarding nutrition education, I would again like to quote one of our witnesses. Mr. Hendrick Wentink of the Poultry and Egg Institute of America. He states,

". . . while nutrition education historically has nowhere received the emphasis it has deserved, it cannot be disputed that the USDA is exerting aggressive leadership in the area today. Secretary Bergland has formed a Human Nutrition Policy Committee to coordinate all USDA nutrition programs included food assistance, safety, quality research and education. Interim regulations to implement nutrition education grants to the states under the 1977 Child Nutrition Act amendments have been promulgated. The Department is conducting a novel nutrition awareness project which will test out a multimedia approach for issuing and reinforcing nutrition messages. Authority under recent amendments of the National School Lunch Act to prohibit the sale of "junk food" in participating schools is being invoked. The focus of Extension activities is being expanded to reach urban areas more effectively. The very substantial Expanded Food & Nutrition Program within the Extension Service is developing a special program to emphasize nutrition counseling for food stamp users. And these are far from all the fronts of the USDA's nutrition education campaign."

It has been stated that the best place for nutrition education is in the schools. I agree. But I also ask, if educators are so interested in nutrition education, why have they not instituted these programs in the schools? The answer, of course, is that they are not interested. In fact, they are so disinterested that they have actually promoted non-nutritious "junk foods" in the schools. In order to raise extra money, they have candy and soda machines in the schools. These junk food machines compete with the nutritious lunches served in the school cafeteria. Congress recognized this problem, a problem created by educators, last year when it mandated USDA to ban the sale of junk foods that compete with the school lunch program. USDA has responded to that mandate and that ban is going into effect this summer. How can we justify transfering these programs to a Department which will be dominated by such insensitive interests?

In conclusion, the question has been asked, "Where will these programs best operate and serve our nation's children?" The answer is that they will best operate and serve our children in USDA. As the former Ranking Minority Member of the Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs, I have watchd with great satisfaction the growth of the child nutrition programs. Due to the work of the Nutrition Committee, we have come to understand that it is vitually important that our food, nutrition and agricultural policies be coordinated. As Senator Talmadge stated in a letter to the Committee, co-signed by the entire Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry, USDA is the best place for achieving maximum coordination. In the letter, he states.

"GAO in a recent report on nutrition research, found 'a lack of central focus and coordination' to be the number one barrier to progress in the area. We feel certain that progress in evolving a food and agricultural policy is equally dependent on having a central focus. If the development of a national energy policy demanded a new Department of Energy to coordinate and pull together all aspects of the problem, then we insist that the same principle applies to the development of a national food, nutrition, and agriculture policy. The nutrition programs should not be sent to other agencies or departments; indeed the food-related functions of other departments should be consolidated within the Department of Agriculture."

As I have shown, educators have a marked distinterest in nutrition education and in the school feeding programs. On the other hand, USDA has demonstrated great interest and enthusiasm. Transfer of these programs would not solve any problems, it would only create new ones. The child nutrition programs should and must remain in a broadbased Department of Agriculture.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., July 13, 1978.

Hon. ABRAHAM RIBICOFF,
Chairman, Governmental Affairs Committee, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We have read with interest your statement in the Congressional Record of July 10 with regard to the transfer of the child nutrition programs from the Department of Agriculture to the proposed Cabinet-level Department of Education that would be created under S. 991.

While recognizing that this is an issue on which reasonable people can differ, there are a number of points we wish to make that we feel provide compelling reasons why the child nutrition programs, including school lunch, should remain in the Department of Agriculture.

First, we do not believe that the Department of Education could—or should—"meet all the developmental needs of children"—as you state. If that were the goal of the new department, it would mean transferring the Child Health Assessment Program, the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development, the Maternal and Child Health and Crippled Children Services, and a host of other child development programs of the Federal government. It is our understanding that these programs are not proposed to be included within the jurisdiction of the Department of Education.

We—and we believe we speak for all members of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry—respectfully disagree that "education and nutrition are inextricably linked." If that were the case, it would be logical to transfer the Special Supplemental Food Program, the Emergency Food and Nutrition Educational Program, the Food Stamp Program, and nutrition research to the Department of Education. But this is not proposed.

Indeed, we believe that it is nutrition and agriculture that are "inextricably linked." This would also appear to be the perception of the Senate in formally adding "Nutrition" to the jurisdiction and name of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry under S. Res. 4.

We also cannot accept the implication of your July 10 statement that the Department of Agriculture traditionally has been unreceptive to nutrition issues. A study of the development of Federal involvement in this area clearly indicates otherwise.

The original mandate creating the Department of Agriculture in 1862 envisioned U.S.D.A. as being involved with the issues of food production and consumption. The first appropriation by the Congress to a Federal agency specifically for studies in human nutrition was made to the Department of Agriculture in 1893.

Later, the Research and Marketing Act of 1946 elaborated upon this general mission, provided specific legislative authority, and directed the Secretary of U.S.D.A.:

To conduct and to stimulate research into the laws and principles underlying the basic problem of agriculture in its broadest aspects, including but not limited to . . . research into the problems of human nutrition and the nutritive value of agricultural commodities, with particular reference to their content of vitamins, minerals, amino and fatty acids, and all other constituents that may be found necessary for the health of the consumer and to gains or losses in nutritive value that may take place at any stage in their production, distribution, processing and preparation by the consumer. Including such investigations as have for their purpose . . . the maximum contribution by agriculture to the welfare of the consumer.

The Food and Agriculture Act of 1977 passed by the Congress less than a year ago, declared:

That there is increasing evidence of a relationship between diet and many of the leading causes of death in the United States; that improved nutrition is an integral component of preventive health care; that there is a serious need for research on the chronic effect of diet on degenerative diseases and related disorders; that nutrition and health considerations are important to United States Agriculture policy.

Most recently, the Secretary of Agriculture, Bob Bergland, told the Congress:

We think this country must develop a policy around human nutrition, around which we build a food policy for this country and as much of this world as is interested. And in that framework we have to fashion a more rational farm policy. We've been going at it from the wrong end in the past.

Central to the development of a national nutrition policy is the Nation's food program's: food stamps, school lunch, school breakfast, and WIC among others. These programs which represent the Nation's backbone in the fight against hunger must be built upon as we broaden our knowledge in the area of nutrition and begin to address other important nutrition issues: obesity, the relationship between diet and disease, nutrition research, food labelling, and nutrition education.

Indeed, as we progress into these other issues the food programs may provide a valuable source of information for consumption data, a forum for nutrition education, and perhaps other research information. In short, it is of paramount importance that the United States have a coordinated food and agriculture policy. To accomplish that goal we are strongly persuaded that these two areas must remain united in the Department of Agriculture.

Rather than suffering from neglect at U.S.D.A., the child nutrition programs have enjoyed consistent growth and expansion, as you acknowledged. This is true not only of the school lunch program, but of other U.S.D.A. administered feeding programs as well. Nor do we understand why an Assistant Secretary for Child Nutrition in the Department of Education would be in a stronger advocacy position for the child nutrition program within the administration than is the existing Assistant Secretary for Food and Consumer Services in the Department of Agriculture.

Finally, we are aware, as you pointed out, that a number of state school administrative offices support the transfer of the school lunch program to the Department of Education. These officials have responsibility for all education activities in their respective states. But we believe it is significant that the American School Food Services Association (ASFSA) representing 70,000 administrators who direct, manage, and work in school nutrition programs at the state and local levels strongly oppose the school lunch transfer. These are the professionals who have direct responsibility for feeding the Nation's 25 million children who daily participate in the school lunch program.

The ASFSA position is shared by the Children's Foundation, the Community Nutrition Institute, the Food Research and Action Center (FRAC), American Academy of Pediatrics, and other prominent organizations concerned about child nutrition. We think the people who make up these organizations are in the best position to advise Congress on this crucial question.

We appreciate the opportunity to make these observations to you and to your colleagues on the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee as you prepare to complete mark-up on S. 991.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, for some time I have been extremely concerned about the problems that small communities must face as they apply to Government assistance programs. I have repeatedly been contacted by municipal leaders who find it nearly impossible to comply with the exorbitant amount of regulations and keep up with the paperwork generated.

By way of example, last fall I was contacted by the small city of Truth or Consequences, N. Mex., concerning the town's lack of capability to maintain an in-house staff to keep up with this Government redtape. Specifically, the city made reference to its experiences in receiving funding for a wastewater treatment project. The project, which was conceived in 1970, with an estimated cost of around $1 million, underwent numerous changes and last fall was scheduled to be completed in February of this year at a cost of $2 million—twice as much as was originally projected.

Because of Truth or Consequences' difficulties, I began to explore possible remedies. Because part of the difficulty was a paperwork problem, I turned to the Commission on Federal Paperwork and its final report to see if the problems facing a community such as Truth or Consequences were addressed. The solutions posed by the Commission, which, among other things, included the establishment of a special agency on Federal paperwork, did not begin to address itself to the real essence of the problems facing small communities.

I was in a quandary as to where to turn next. I knew that last session in the committee reorganization bill, Senate Resolution 4, a section had been included to require each committee to consider the impact of any legislation being reported out in terms of the paperwork involved, however, that amendment did not apply to past laws and the impact that they were currently having on the country.

Fortunately, the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH) has proposed a bill entitled the "Small Communities Act of 1978." I commend my colleague on this important piece of legislation, for this bill is a first step in addressing the specific problems that face a small community as it attempts to approach the Federal Government for assistance. What this bill does is to consolidate grant rules and regulations of different agencies to make the application process easier and less burdensome for small communities. I am happy to join the Senator from Missouri as a cosponsor of this legislation and hope that this bill will begin to draw attention to the plight of the small community.

As well, I would like to request that the letter which I received from the city of Truth or Consequences be printed in the RECORD, for I believe that this is an extremely good explanation of the difficulties facing small communities who apply for Federal assistance.

The letter follows:

TRUTH OR CONSEQUENCES, N. MEX.,
September 21, 1977.

HON. PETE V. DOMENICI,
U.S. Senator, East Griggs Avenue,
Las Cruces, N. Mex.

DEAR SENATOR DOMENICI: Reference is made to our recent discussion regarding the multitude of administrative and financial burdens mandated upon small towns.

The complexity and redundancy of federal regulations are particularly onerous for small "non-hold harmless" towns that are not eligible for yearly funding or "up front" financial aid for planning services. The lack of a strong tax base makes it almost impossible to maintain basic services, employ additional personnel to plan for and administer federal/state programs and simultaneously set aside matching funds required by mandated federal/state programs.

This lack of capability to employ an in-house staff, places a small town at the mercy of 1) professional management/engineering firms whose income is largely based upon project dollar totals, and 2) the federal/state bureaucracy who mandate the regulations under which the various programs are carried out. Further, both federal/state agencies, in turn, exercise design supervision, monetary and administrative control over the majority of participatory programs.

Local governments have little, if any, say so in their own community as to the scope and/or costs of mandated programs. However, should a local government decline to participate in a mandate program, they are subject to federal court jurisdiction and may be legally coerced into participation regardless of desire or financial ability.

An example of project aggrandizement, which I do not believe is unique, is our Wastewater Collection and Treatment Project—as conceived in 1970, costs were estimated at $138,284, after intervention of State (EIA) and Federal (EPA) agencies, estimated costs were increased to $1,023,707 as of January, 1973—from January 1973 to date there were a number of mandated scope and design changes, (I am not counting routine administrative changes) which have resulted in today's estimated cost of $2,002,923 for a project that is not scheduled for completion until February 1978. Should there be additional changes it is impossible to estimate the final cost of this project. It must be said that a considerable percentage of cost increases have root in environmental pollution control standards and of recent years runaway inflation.

With your kind indulgence, I will attempt restructuring high points of one project in hope it will give you an insight into the problems of a small town, that has literally no control of its own destiny, as far as federal/state governments bureaucracy is concerned. See Attachment I Should you become bored and/or confused by perusal of Attachment I, which is an abbreviated account of just one project imagine the problems associated with being simultaneously involved with ten federal and five state agencies, (plus consulting engineers). All with a different set of regulations, financial accounting systems, reporting procedures, and with assumed authority to make decisions, (which in many cases are retroactive for the convenience of the agency) effecting the day to day operations of a municipal government, and in many cases do not reflect the intent of the Congress.

For small towns who by and large are governed by elected laymen serving on a part time basis, with no experience or exposure to federal/state agencies (except IRS),—these part time governments are confronted with the identical federal/state regulations and paper work load as is Albuquerque, which is a hold-harmless city with funding for planning and administrative costs, for the federal/state bureaucracies to demand a perfect level of performance from small towns who are not funded to employ qualified personnel to cope with the endless stream of federal/state paper and maintain daily operations is at best ludicrous.

A further problem is the lack of qualified personnel familiar with federal/state rules and regulations, to watch over the best interest of small municipalities, results in "Management by default" either the consulting engineer or the bureaucracy.

My recommendations on this problem are:

1. Establish a firm fixed % of all grant programs for planning and administrative costs regardless of population of the community involved. A % figure would provide small local governments with foreknowledge of funding available to assist in the payment of the additional planning/administrative costs entailed in all federal/state programs. These funds should be made available on an "up front" basis—of course, contingent upon agency acceptance of a local grant request for federal/state assistance.

2. Establish for all agencies a standard engineering services contract that clearly sets forth responsibilities and compensation factors for contracted engineering services. To my knowledge the best example is: FmHA, Form FHA 442–19 (Revised 7–21–67), which is specific as to responsibilities and FmHA in this contract specifically establishes compensation limits—there is no leeway for project design change, scope increase, etc., without prior consultation and approval by FmHA, local government concerned.

3. Standardization and simplification of administrative and financial reporting regulations, basic assurances relating to civil rights, discrimination, equal opportunity, utilization of small and/or minority businesses, pecuniary responsibilities etc., are spelled out in the U.S. Code, why the necessity of each agency re-working and requiring a different reporting format to comply with one basic law; an example the HUD–CDBG program grant agreement—15 pages in length contains 46 references to various Public Laws, CFR's. USC's, Executive Orders, and the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974—none of which say anything not contained in the codes of the Law other than being couched in HUD terminology.

Recommendation one simplified standard compliance form for all agencies to be signed and executed by the responsible local governmental officials.

4. Without doubt HUD is the epitomy of repetitious bureaucratic paper work, an example is the completed 27 page "grantee performance report" (enclosure 2)—concerning HUD Project B–75–DN–35–0003—Water Systems Improvements (Drilling of 2 Wells) as you may note from the enclosure the vast majority of information requested concerns "housing" which by the wildest stretch of the imagination cannot be associated with drilling water wells.

On February 9, 1976 the 1st copy of this report was forwarded—on May 11, 1976, a 2nd (revised form) copy with the identical information was forwarded as a part of an application for a paving assistance grant—on January 5, 1977 the same essential information was forwarded as a part of an application for Storm Drainage and Paving Assistance—on March 11, 1977 another complete 27-page copy (the 3rd) was forwarded, the only change in information context was that the project had been completed. All of the information requested directly relating to drilling the wells could have been answered by a half page letter report.

Recommendation: elimination of repetitive reporting requirements for the same information, particularly information unrelated to the project in question.

5. Another quaint habit of the bureaucracy is ignoring their own regulations while at the same time demanding absolute compliance by local governments—an example is the attached correspondence (enclosure 3) from the city to HUD, Dallas—to date no reply has been received.

6. The continuous revision of rules and regulations (HUD and EPA are the worst offenders) which are primarily administrative and by and large do not alter the basis of a program, impose a considerable amount of unnecessary paper work on a small community, and on the surface appear to be a bureaucratic "make work" operation rather than an attempt to improve program content.

7. Attachment No. 4 is a sequential report of funding for the Wastewater Facilities project, which I do believe will indicate the financial uncertainties faced by a local government in paying their bills when due.

I wish to express my gratitude to you for taking time out of a busy schedule to look at this problem. I do appreciate the fact that this letter with all of its enclosures is voluminous, but do not know a better way to illustrate the magnitude of paper work requirements faced by Truth or Consequences and hundreds of small towns across the nation.

In conclusion, I do hope this will be of assistance to you in your continuing efforts to reduce federal/state red tape. My sincere best wishes to you for the future.

Sincerely,

QUENTIN M. DRUNZER,
City Manager.●

HUMAN RIGHTS AND CYPRUS

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, the tragedy of Cyprus is first of all a tragedy of human beings. While the legal and constitutional issues must be solved, we today witness about 200,000 refugees driven from their homes. In this brutal process, about 4,000 were killed and several thousand are still missing.

The Honorable L. G. Loucaides, Deputy Attorney General of Cyprus, recently addressed the Limassol, Cyprus Rotary Club and spoke of this aspect of the Cyprus issue. I ask that the text of his remarks be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

THE CONTINUING VIOLATIONS OF HUMAN RIGHTS BY TURKEY IN CYPRUS WITH PARTICULAR REFERENCE TO THE STAND TAKEN BY THE COUNCIL OF EUROPE AND TO THE U.S. POLICY ON HUMAN RIGHTS

As we all know, taking advantage of the coup against the President of the Republic Archbishop Makarios, Turkey, on the 20th July, 1974, invaded Cyprus with the alleged aim of re-establishing the Constitutional Order and safeguarding the rights of all Cypriots.

The human tragedy caused by the Turkish invasion to the people of Cyprus far from justifying the aims of such invasion as claimed by Turkey, in order to deceive the world opinion, revealed the real policy and objectives of the invasion.

On setting foot on the Cyprus territory the Turkish army began implementing a prearranged and organized plan of full scale atrocities against the Greek Cypriot inhabitants of the northern part of Cyprus with the object of eradicating and exterminating the Greek population of a large area consisting of about 40 percent of the island, which came to be known as the "Attila line," and supplanting them with Turks. The ultimate aim of the plan was to convert by artificial means the Turkish occupied areas into Turkish populated areas under the full authority and control of Turkey and change the demographic structure of Cyprus, in furtherance of the long followed policy of partitioning the island under the guise of federation.

That was the Turkish policy all along both before and after the establishment of the Cyprus Republic.

TURKISH CLAIM ON CYPRUS

As far back as 1955 the Turkish Foreign Minister the late Zorlou, made no secret at the Tripartite Conference on Eastern Mediterranean and Cyprus held in London in August-September 1955, that Turkey had claims on Cyprus.

The same claims were repeated in June 1964 by the then Turkish Foreign Minister Mr. Erkin when at the London Conference on Cyprus he described the geographical position of Cyprus as being a continuation of the Anatolian Peninsula and that it had a vital importance for Turkey "on account of its geostrategic bearing."

In order to implement the said policy, the Turkish forces ever since the invasion have been engaging in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognised human rights in the occupied areas of Cyprus in the form of murders and other physical violence, forcible expulsion, looting of whole towns and villages, robbery and usurpation of properties, arbitrary detention, deprivation of freedom of movement and inhuman and degrading treatment of thousands of persons of all ages and of both sexes.

All these crimes were directed against the Greek Cypriots simply because of their ethnic origin, race and religion.

Almost four years have elapsed since the Turkish invasion of Cyprus. The resulting organised and massive violations of human rights are unprecedented in recent history.

Of course the rate of atrocities in the form of physical violence, as compared with crimes against property, gradually decreased as the Greek population of the occupied areas became less and less numerous. Having managed to evacuate these areas of the bulk of the Greek Cypriot population—which are still prevented to return to their homes—Turkey had no need to continue engaging in atrocities against the remaining Greek Cypriot inhabitants with the same ferocity as during the first year after the invasion. But violations of basic human rights such as the right to respect one's private family life, his home and property, the freedom of movement etc. continue unabated and on a permanent basis in order to maintain by the force of arms the "Attila" line.

A MATTER OF HUMAN RIGHTS

And while the human drama of Cyprus, reminiscent of medieval ages, still continues in its main parts, the Cyprus problem—which is nothing else than a humanitarian problem—does not seem to occupy in its true nature the civilised world.

The Cyprus problem is considered as a difference between Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots or a difference between Greece and Turkey; as a constitutional or political question while in actual fact it is a pure question of protection of human rights.

The remedy suggested for the continuing violations of human rights by Turkey in Cyprus is for the two communities of the island, in other words the innocent victims, to negotiate the terms under which such violations will be condoned and accepted on a permanent basis, and this again under the threat of arms.

The net result is that the true sense of the Cyprus problem is disguised and disappears in political expediencies.

The reaction of the international community in respect of the Cyprus tragedy has been until now generally very disappointing.

COUNCIL AT EUROPE FAILURE

Even the Council of Europe which because of the legal commitments of its members and its basic philosophy for the protection of human rights in the European space, was raising expectations for a clear and effective decision against Turkey, has failed until now to carry out its responsibilities.

I am referring in this respect to the decision of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe taken on 21st October 1977 in respect of the Applications filed by the Cyprus Government against Turkey in September 1974 and March 1975 for the violations of human rights by Turkey in Cyprus.

The Applications were originally filed before the European Commission of Human Rights of the Council of Europe which is the appropriate legal organ of the Council for investigating complaints for violations of the European Convention on Human Rights by any member state, in this case Turkey. The Commission is composed of jurists representing all member-states of the Council of Europe.

On 26th May, 1975 the Commission rejected the legal objections of Turkey in respect of the Cyprus Applications including the objection that the Cyprus Government was not legally representing the Republic of Cyprus and the objection that the violations complained of did not relate to an area within Turkey's jurisdiction. Thereafter the Commission investigated the complaints of the Cyprus Government. They collected evidence and heard witnesses.

COMMISSION REPORT ADOPTED

Turkey disregarded the proceedings before the Commission ever since the rejection of her legal objections, and refused to participate in the investigation of the charges against her or to reply to them, on the pretext that her participation would amount to recognition of the Cyprus Government.

The Commission carried out its task in a judicial and objective manner, and in July 1976 adopted a Report setting out their findings. The Report was submitted to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe in August 1976.

Although this Report is confidential its contents became known through a publication of the English Newspaper "SUNDAY TIMES" in January 1977. According to this publication, the accuracy of which was not disputed by Turkey, the Turkish Government was found guilty by the Commission for the gross violations of human rights complained of by the Cyprus Government.

The final task for taking action on the basis of the said Report belonged to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe which is the highest executive organ of the Council of Europe.

The Committee before deciding the issue asked for the views of the Turkish Government. Turkey then in an effort to politicize the question of violations of human rights by her forces in Cyprus presented a voluminous document full of unfounded and misleading allegations which she refused to place before the Commission of Human Rights for legal scrutiny. In the said paper there were also counter allegations for violations by the Cyprus Government (described by Turkey as "Greek Cypriot Administration") of human rights of the Turkish Cypriots, which again Turkey never dared to place before the Commission for investigation though challenged to do so. Such allegations could not be the subject of consideration by the Committee of Ministers and could not in any way, either legally or morally, provide a justification for the violations of human rights of the Greek Cypriots by Turkey, especially having regard to the big scale and continuing nature of such violations as found by the Commission.

A TAINTED COMPROMISE

In spite of all that the Committee of Ministers in October last, came up with a compromising politically tainted and motivated inconclusive decision in respect of the complaints of the Cyprus Government. The Committee in a vague way found that violations of unspecified human rights in general took place in Cyprus and interlinked the question of their restoration with the intercommunal talks.

Although the Committee reserved the right to revert on the subject in nine months' time, a provision that leaves room for some hope, the fact remains that by its decision in question the Committee failed to keep the letter and spirit of the European Convention on Human Rights.

The theory was advanced that the stand taken by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe was aiming at affording the opportunity to Turkey to restore voluntarily the human rights violated by her, through a political solution of the Cyprus problem before a final clear cut decision against Turkey was taken. Hence the proviso for a right of the Committee to revert on the matter in nine months' time. According to the same theory to condemn or penalize Turkey outright would have made it impossible for the Government to cooperate in the implementation of her obligations under the Convention. Whether this theory will produce any results remains to be seen. Personally I doubt its effectiveness considering Turkey's attitude on the Cyprus problem all along.

A POLITICAL REPORT

The fact remains that the Council of Europe, through the Committee of Ministers has politicized the issue of violations of human rights in Cyprus and has thus failed to carry out its responsibilities under the Convention. It is only to be hoped that the Committee will revert on the matter and change its attitude; and that in any case a more effective decision will be taken in the new proceedings against Turkey brought during last September before the Council of Europe by the Cyprus Government for the continuing violations of human rights in the occupied areas. These proceedings are now pending before the Commission of Human Rights and are to be examined during the session of the Commission in July next.

What is interesting however about the stand taken by the Council of Europe is that it seems to reflect the general policy of the Western countries towards the Cyprus problem; the policy of avoiding offending or exposing in any way Turkey, an important ally of the Western block. Therefore one is tempted to believe that the majority of the member-states of the Council of Europe are following an attitude on the issue of violations of human rights by Turkey in Cyprus which is more compatible with their strategic interests rather than with the principles of human rights which they advocate. For how else the indulgences shown to Turkey in the field of human rights can be explained at a time when the Western countries seem to be oversensitive for violations of human rights elsewhere such as in the Soviet Union and South Africa.

That inevitably reminds us of the U.S.

policy on human rights which in this respect calls for some comment.

During the presidential campaign of 1976 Mr. Carter identified human rights as an important issue. Admitting that the record of the U.S. was not faultless in this regard he pledged himself to make an active concern for human rights throughout the world a key goal of American foreign policy.

PRESIDENT CARTER'S RECORD

Early in his presidency he criticized the Soviet Government for repressing dissident intellectuals. Then his accusing finger swept around the horizon, pointing to violations of human rights in Africa, particularly in Uganda, in Latin America and in Asia. He also sent his Secretary of State, Cyrus Vance before Congress to warn that U.S. military and economic aid would be cut or withheld from any country that consistently violated human rights.

Given the policy of the new U.S. Government the people of Cyprus accepted with joy the change of the administration in U.S. However with the passage of time it was most disappointing to find out that the new Administration persistently ignored the flagrant violations of human rights by Turkey in Cyprus. The accusing finger of President Carter failed to point towards the direction of Turkey. On the contrary by his recent report on human rights in Cyprus President Carter made an obvious attempt to exonerate the Turkish occupation forces from responsibility for the continuing violations of human rights in Cyprus and tried to politicise the issue in a similar way as the Council of Europe had done. President Carter has even decided few days ago to ask the Congress to lift the embargo on U.S. Security Assistance to Turkey although the Turkish forces continue to violate through their occupation of the northern part of Cyprus basic human rights of the Greek-Cypriot population.

One therefore cannot but suspect that President Carter's policy on human rights is not free from political expendiencies and that other considerations such as strategic are prevailing and overshadowing this policy. In the words of Mr. Talbott, the diplomatic correspondent for TIME magazine "a repressive government fortunate enough to find itself on the hot line of World War III enjoys a special dispensation from the Carter Administration and can violate the rights of its citizens with less fear of American pressure than say, Argentina or Ethiopia."

U.S. CREDIBILITY INVOLVED

On our part we say that this selective application by U.S. of the universal principles of human rights cannot but result inevitably to the crumbling down of the whole philosophy of the new foreign policy of the U.S. regarding human rights. Mr. Carter's pledge to restore morality to U.S. foreign policy so as to correspond to the values of the American people is therefore bound eventually to lose its credibility.

President Carter during the Presidential campaign was accusing the Ford Administration and in particular Henry Kissinger of conducting "cynical policies" and of "seeking might at the expense of right". Yet one is tempted now to consider these words as applicable to the stand taken by the Carter Administration in respect to the violations of human rights by Turkey in Cyprus.

We do consider it useful to add that even from the point of view of strategic interests U. States' attitude towards Turkey will eventually prove ineffective since a government which consistently violates human rights could not be an ally of a doubtful value. For what is the point of having an ally who acts contrary to the very principles that the alliance is supposed to be defending.

In his report President Carter supports the position that "human rights in Cyprus cannot be treated in isolation from political considerations." The decision of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe seems also to be based on the same premise. This is an entirely wrong approach since it implies that violations of human rights can take place continually ad infinitum pending the settlement of political issues.

INTERIM STEPS NEEDED

It is correct that political settlements could give a final and durable protection of the human rights in issue; and that efforts should be directed towards the achievement of such a lasting solution of the problem. But the question is whether in the meantime human rights may be denied.

If one proceeds on what should be the correct assumption that any settlement of any political issue should safeguard human rights and should be reached through peaceful means, then the correct approach should be that restoration of human rights should not await the settlement of related political issues but on the contrary it should be used as a means to bring about such settlement. This is not only dictated by humanitarian and juridical considerations but also by the practical necessity in the interest of world peace and welfare not to allow states for any reason to have unfettered freedom to deny the basic human rights and freedoms to people under their authority. This is the raison d' etre of any human rights system. To accept the contrary would inevitably lead us backwards to the times when oppression in any form was an acceptable instrument for creating law.

If political differences were allowed to block the way to the protection of human rights that would render the very notion of human rights entirely meaningless; for serious violations of human rights are as a rule the result of political controversies. If, then, it is accepted, that no remedy is possible pending the solution of such controversies this would amount to condoning continuous violations of human rights on any scale and on a permanent basis at times when these rights are in special need of protection.

The existing international institutions for the enforcement and protection of human rights may not as yet be sufficiently equipped to give an effective remedy to situations such as the ones under consideration. But both they and all states concerned with the protection of human rights certainly can and should exercise pressure on those governments that are violating these rights by approaching the problem correctly, free from any political expediency, and condemning outright and without hesitation any such violations, mindful always of the necessity and usefulness of such condemnation. For apart from the other evident, beneficial moral and political effects this is the only way to maintain the essential principle that power or physical victory is not enough to give legal backing to the resulting faits accomplis or other situations so long as they amount to contraventions of the basic humanitarian rules and the principles of international law.

Maintaining that principle may by itself be quite effective for to use Rousseau's own words, "the powerful is never so powerful as to remain himself always a master unless he succeeds to convert his power to a legal right and the obedience due to him to a moral duty."

I should add on our part that we will not yield to power and we will not give a legal right to the powerful. We will never give up our human rights for, as rightly observed by the U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher in his speech before the American Bar Association last August, "It is, after all, these rights that make life worth living."●

LUKYANENKO: 30 YEARS IN SOVIET GULAG?

● Mr. CASE. Mr. President, earlier this month, in a remote town in the Ukraine, the Soviets meted out another brutal sentence to yet another of its citizens monitoring Soviet compliance with the Helsinki accords. Of all the republics in which Soviet monitoring groups have been set up, it is the Ukrainian Helsinki Group which has had to pay the heaviest toll in terms of arrests and sentences. Of the 10 original members of the Kiev Group, fully half have received prison terms of at least 12 years.

Lukyanenko was sentenced to a 10-year term in special regimen camps plus 5 years of internal exile. Only 2 years ago, Lukyanenko returned from a previous 15-year term in the GULAG. In 1961, Lukyanenko was sentenced for supporting the idea that the Western Ukraine vote on a referendum on withdrawal from the Soviet Union. For this, Lukyanenko has had to spend 15 years in prisons, camps, and psychiatric hospitals.

It seems that one of the most serious charges against Mr. Lukyanenko is that as a founding member of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group, he wrote a document on systematic discrimination against Ukrainians who desire to emigrate, using his own case as an example.

Away from the eyes of the West, dissidents such as Levko Lukyanenko continue to suffer Soviet reaction against dissent and documentation of abuse.

People in the West tend to hear less about Soviet dissidents who live outside Moscow. This does not mean that those people who live in other parts of the U.S.S.R. are less deserving of our support. This does not mean that Ukrainian dissidents are less important than their Moscow counterparts. It does mean that we should redouble our efforts to make the fates of these stalwart men and women better understood in the West.●

INDIAN ALCOHOLISM CONFERENCE

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, in December of 1977, the Office of Navajo Economic Opportunity's alcoholism program sponsored an All Indian Alcoholism Conference in Albuquerque, N. Mex. During that conference, Dr. Robert Bergman, a professor at the University of New Mexico and former psychiatrist on the Navajo Reservation, presented some alarming statistics which support my conclusion that alcoholism is the No. 1 health problem on the Navajo Reservation. In his presentation, Dr. Bergman stated the following:

In New Mexico, five of the ten leading causes of death among Indians are alcohol-related; 90 percent of the persons convicted of murder on the reservation last year were intoxicated at the time of the incident; over 80 percent of all Navajo police arrests were related to alcohol; of 3,238 Indian Health Service hospital cases in Albuquerque in 1976, 1,124 were alcohol-related.

While these startling statistics relate specifically to the Navajo Nation, there is no question in my mind that problems of alcoholism and alcohol abuse are very prevalent among other Indian tribes as well.

The problem of alcoholism and alcohol abuse among American Indians is a relatively new one, but the proportion of Native Americans experiencing alcohol-related difficulties is increasing rapidly. It is estimated by some experts that the incidence of alcoholism among American Indians is as high as 10 to 25 times greater than that for the non-Indian population. My amendment to the Health Planning Act, by authorizing a study of this matter, will provide the Congress with a better understanding of the unique cultural and psychological factors which lead native Americans to alcohol abuse. Once the National Commission on Alcoholism is established and operating, we will have a clearer picture of the scope and extent of alcohol abuse and alcoholism among Indian tribes throughout the country.

Furthermore, it is my hope that this study will go beyond a mere analysis of a grave dilemma. We will have to develop, within a very short period of time, a comprehensive, coordinated, program of dealing with the problem of alcoholism and alcohol abuse among American Indians. I look forward to the results of this study, and to the positive recommendations I know it will produce. Once a thorough assessment of this subject is completed, my colleagues and I will be able to discern the best course of action for combating and overcoming this insidious problem.●

FUNDS FOR VIETNAM

● Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr. Mr. President, the Library of Congress has done a study showing the amount of money the Socialist Republic of Vietnam has received and is likely to receive from international banking institutions.

Much of the funding for the United Nations and the international banks comes from the pockets of the American working men and women, through taxes paid to the Federal Government.

I submit for the RECORD the following memorandum from the Library of Congress:

PRELIMINARY DATA ON INTERNATIONAL FUNDS FOR VIETNAM

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
June 28, 1978.

To the Honorable Harry F. Byrd, Jr.,
Attention Christopher Lehman.
From Jonathan E. Sanford,
Analyst in International Relations.
Via Chief, Foreign Affairs and National Defense Division.

At your request, I am preparing an update to the study which Marjorie Browne and I prepared last year showing how much money might be available to the Socialist Republic of Vietnam in 1977 from international organizaitons. This memorandum provides preliminary data you requested showing the amount which might be available from international organizations in 1978. A more complete analysis of the total, and a report on the programs being funded, will be included in the final update of the study when it is completed.

In 1977, the Socialist Republic of Vietnam obtained about $118.9 million from international organizations, $73 million of it from UNICEF and the World Food Program and another $35.8 million from the IMF.

In 1978, it appears that Vietnam may have about $140.2 million available from international organizations, $54.5 million of it from UNICEF and the World Food Program and $54.9 million from the IMF.

It appears at this time that the World Bank may also approve two loans totalling $150 million for Vietnam in 1978, but the disbursements on those credits will probably not start until 1979 at the earliest.●

BOAT AND LAND PEOPLE

● Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention my distinguished colleagues the work of a fine organization addressing itself to the plight of a very desperate group of refugees, the so-called boat people found in the South China Sea off the coast of Vietnam. For the last 25 years, World Vision International, based in Monrovia, Calif., has been involved in extensive charitable programs around the world. Besides providing swift-acting relief in major disasters, World Vision has completed many agricultural training and water projects in underdeveloped countries and has provided support for nearly 100,000 refugee orphans.

In the present situation, World Vision has taken an important first step to aid the boat people by chartering a large vessel, staffed with medical personnel and stocked with supplies which has made two forays to date into international waters and made contact with them. Although President Carter, in recognition of the problem, recently authorized American vessels to pick up refugees, World Vision, in order to maintain a neutral stance in a delicate political situation, has not taken any aboard up to this point.

As the following editorial details, the refugees face many serious obstacles. Often families are separated, their boats are inadequate, and capture by Vietnamese police boats is frequent. If a boat can reach Thailand admission to that country is still possible, but the Thai Government is overburdened with the 100,000 refugees already there and wants assurance that any new refugees can be transferred to a third country.

It is up to the international community, particularly the United States, to act on behalf of these people. I urge my colleagues to lend their full support to both Federal programs and effective programs in the private sector like that of World Vision.

It is imperative that the United States demonstrate its good faith to the Thai Government by continuing to admit refugees to this country and helping them to make a new beginning once they are here.

I am pleased to offer for your information the editorial which recently appeared in the Richmond Times Dispatch and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch, June 27, 1978]

BOAT AND LAND PEOPLE

Chances of survival for the pitiable "boat people" from Vietnam have been estimated at about 50–50. These are the Vietnamese refugees who put out in the treacherous South China Sea in small fishing boats in desperate efforts to escape communist rule.

At any one time, an estimated 5,000 refugees are adrift. The sea is their only hope because neighboring countries are also communist-ruled. But about half of them perish because of lack of food, medicine and water, the unseaworthiness of their vessels, or attacks by coastal pirates. Many large commercial vessels steer clear of the boat people for fear of having to take them aboard.

Now at least one helping hand is being extended on the water. World Vision International, a Christian organization, has chartered a 345-foot vessel, staffed it with doctors, nurses and mechanics, and stocked it with food, water, clothing, fuel and boat repair parts. The ship will sail the South China Sea in search of refugees in distress until the monsoon season begins in October.

As tragic as the plight of the boat people is, recent developments in Vietnam raise the question whether the "land people"—those left behind—aren't even more to be pitied. Hanoi has announced plans for the forcible ressettlement of four million urban inhabitants by 1980. City dwellers are being moved to so-called "new economic zones" in the regime's effort to spur agricultural production and eradicate the urban middle class. Doubtless many will be worked to death in the fields as slave laborers.

More than one million persons reportedly have perished as a result of neighboring Cambodia's forced evacuations of major cities. A tragedy of that scale could be in the making in Vietnam, which in any case has already executed an estimated 250,000 persons, according to refugee reports.

Even the risky escape route of the open sea is being closed off as part of the new communist crackdown. Fishing boats are being placed under police guard at night, and fishermen have to go out in groups under the surveillance of armed guards.

Critics of American motives in aiding South Vietnam's anticommunist struggle often contended it really didn't make much difference which Vietnamese side won the war; some even suggested the communists were the humanitarians, the pure-spirited "agrarian reformers." But for thousands of boat people—and millions more of land people—the outcome made a drastic, and cruel, difference in their lives.●

S. 3350—THE JOB OPPORTUNITY BONUS ACT OF 1978

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the distinguished and Nobel Prize winning journalist, Mr. George Will, recently described Washington, D.C. as an enclave surrounded on four sides by reality. Perhaps not every one of my colleagues will agree on this working definition of our Nation's Capital. Yet on the subject of jobs, employment, and the pending economic crisis, I believe that the Federal Government has been acting in accordance with this popular definition.

In an effort to do something to improve the Federal Government's reputation among the citizens, and of greater importance, to do something to solve the immediate economic problems we face in the areas of unemployment and inflation, I introduced S. 3350, the Job Opportunity Bonus Act of 1978. The text of my proposed legislation is also offered as a substitute in the form of an amendment to S. 50, the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act of 1978.

The purpose of my bill is to maximize the chances of employment for every American, especially those in the so-called structural category. It is intended to attack the problem both in our urban and rural areas. It is intended to enhance dramatically the job opportunities for young people and our minority citizens who have been especially victimized by the cancer of inflation and the sluggish influenza within our national economy which takes the form of unemployment and increased job instability.

My bill, S. 3350, is predicated on the belief that we can do this without having to tax our fellow Americans out of existence; without having to resort to many of the well intended but vaguely defined gimmickry plaguing the so-called Humphrey-Hawkins bill, S. 50. Certainly the goals of S. 50 and the idealism on which they were forged are shared by nearly everyone in this Chamber. In fact, these goals, as written into particular parts of S. 50 read almost like poetry at times; certainly it is reminiscent of the greatness of our departed colleague, Senator Humphrey.

Tragically, however, the Humphrey-Hawkins legislation loses in practical application and hard economics what it makes up for in inspiring reading. H.R. 50 and S. 50 offer generalized national planning solutions and unreachable economic targets when the worst unemployment problems are among specific groups. In a nation which remains committed to private capitalism as our basic system of economy, the Humphrey-Hawkins bill would significantly enlarge the role of the Federal Government in our economic planning. The bill would expand public service employment by forcing the Federal budget upward by at least several billion dollars. Nearly every working economist who has reviewed the bill, from Milton Friedman to John Kenneth Galbraith, agrees that this approach would add 2 to 4 points on our national rate of inflation. What the long-term effects would be, and what they portend for the future of our beleaguered economy is anyone's guess. In short, the Humphrey-Hawkins bill is the last grasp of New Deal economics. If the time was ever right for such a bill, and the overwhelming arguments are against it, that time has passed.

Mr. President, I believe that there is a better way. I believe that we can use the machinery of our Federal Government in a proper, in a responsible way to cooperate with the private and independent sector of our economy to solve the problem of structural unempolyment, to relieve the high level of joblessness among minorities and youth. The national unemployment rate at any one time over the last 2 years has hovered between 4.7 and 6 percent. But for women, the rate has been 5.8 percent; for black members of the work force, it has been 11.8 percent; and for black teenagers, a staggering 35.8 percent. My legislation will use private rather than public dollars to fund the solution to this everpresent problem. It will provide a social bonus to private sector businessmen and to independent sector leaders such as charitable organization heads, nonprofit research organizations and others. It will give them the incentive to offer job opportunities which do not now exist, and to provide lasting job skills to those desperately in search of them; to those desperately looking for a way to restore their economic independence and their dignity as citizens in what is ironically the most affluent society in the world.

We can do these things, and we can do them without depressing our affluence or compromising our liberties. We can do it without having to suspend diplomatic relations with economic reality. Proposition 13 is exactly just such a reality. If nothing else, it is a signal to Washington —a signal to us not that America is insensitive; not that our fellow citizens seek to deny the American dream to others. It is a signal that America is in pain, in pain because of the continuing oppression of inflation and limitless taxation.

Mr. President, I believe that my measure, S. 3350, is a reasonable way out of our present economic dilemma. In the days ahead, I will continue to address myself to this issue. As always, I seek the counsel and the cooperation of my distinguished colleagues in enacting legislation to solve our problem.●

SUPPORT FOR WATER BANK PROGRAM IMPROVEMENTS

● Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I would like to share with my colleagues an editorial which appeared in the August edition of Fins & Feathers, supporting legislation I have introduced, S. 3198, to improve wetlands conservation.

The water bank is a Federal program created in 1970 to preserve wetlands and provide nesting habitat for waterfowl and other wildlife. The Water Bank Act was enacted in order to discourage the conversion of the Nation's wetlands to agricultural uses that are incompatible with the critical natural functions wetlands provide. I believe the water bank program should be an incentive program. It should be economically feasible and attractive to the farmer or landowner to place these areas in the water bank.

Similar legislation, currently pending before the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, is expected to be acted upon shortly. I am hopeful that the Senate Subcommittee on Environment, Soil Conservation and Forestry will take action on this legislation in the very near future. While we still have over 75 million acres of wetlands remaining, conversion continues at a rate of 200,000 to 300,000 acres a year.

Mr. President, I ask that the Fins & Feathers editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

HUMPHREY WATER BANK PROGRAM IS BADLY NEEDED

In our November, 1977 editorial, we wrote about a great program which has not been allowed to reach its potential. The federal Water Bank Program was established to help preserve and restore one of our nation's most important but threatened resources—our wetlands. Without denying that the program has accomplished a lot in the first several years of its existence, we have to report that it has been shackled with an inadequate level of funding, and consequently has not met the objectives Congress envisioned for it.

That would change if Congress passes a bill recently introduced by Senator Muriel Humphrey (co-sponsored by Wendell Anderson and several others). The bill, S. 3198, would increase the level of funding from 10 million to 50 million dollars annually. Passage of this bill would benefit everyone—farmers, the general public, sportsmen and wildlife.

The Water Bank Program works by offering landowners an incentive to preserve or improve wetlands. They sign a lease for a ten year period, offering to preserve or restore the wetlands in return for an annual payment. This payment compensates them for the money they could realize by draining the marshes and putting them into production.

At least that's the way the program would work if it were properly funded. As it is, Minnesota's payments are so low that farmers are reluctant to enter the program. Some who signed ten year leases in the program's early years are bitter about the mistake they made, since land values have soared in the years since the program's funding level was established. An incentive program with no true incentive is not going to work. If you offer a farmer a $5 per acre rental fee when he can rent cropland for $80 an acre, you are not offering much incentive!

The Humphrey bill would address that problem. Those who have worked with the program estimate that passage of the bill would allow us to add 20 to 30 thousand acres in Minnesota each year to the amount of land preserved for wildlife.

In addition to the funding inadequacy, a few other problems have limited the effectiveness of the Water Bank Program. Some of these have been technical in nature, others have been administrative. But the biggest limitation so far has been poor funding. Incentives that sounded pretty good in 1970 when Congress set the program up just don't work in the world of 1978 land values.

Sportsmen don't need to hear how valuable marshes and their associated upland acres are. Even if they weren't vital to wildlife production, they would be important for their functions as nutrient traps, flood control devices and maintainers of healthy water levels. Wetlands are a critical part of our environment. And they are being destroyed at an alarming rate.

But sportsmen may not have given enough thought to the plight of farmers who own wetlands. What is good for society (namely keeping or restoring wetlands) is often bad for individual farmers. They are trying to survive in a very difficult financial climate, one which continues to drive smaller and less efficient farms out of existence. Even if they are aware of the importance of wetlands, individual farmers can not often afford to pass by the financial gains from draining marshes and turning the lands into production—even when those acres just go into a "set-aside program." If marshes are important to society, and they obviously are, the only fair way to protect them is to share the cost of preservation through a program like Water Bank.

We can't tell how much opposition the Humphrey bill will get. Humphrey will not be back in the Senate next year, and some of the bill's other co-sponsors are also not returning. Senator Anderson faces a very difficult campaign this year and is now trailing in the polls.

Clearly, Minnesota sportsmen need to speak out in favor of this bill, making it clear that we mean to fight to preserve our precious wetland areas. The Water Bank Program offers the best hope for that. It is time to get the program a full level of funding so it can do what it was created to do.●

NO NEED TO REINSTITUTE DRAFT

● Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Housing and Urban Development Subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee will be considerning the fiscal year 1979 appropriation for the Selective Service Agency today when the full committee meets to mark up the HUD-Independent Agencies appropriations bill.

In light of the expressed interest of the Senate Armed Services Committee to significantly expand the function of the Selective Service Agency as reflected in both its report language and the $17 million authorization level for the agency, I find it extremely appropriate and timely that several of the top officials in the Defense Department have made strong statements denying the alleged inadequacy of U.S. manpower levels to provide for our Nation's security requirements.

Mr. President, in acknowledging that there are some natural problems which will arise in any military recruitment system of the size necessay to maintain present force levels, Secretary of Defense Harold Brown, Army Chief of Staff General Bernard Rogers, and Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower, Reserve Affairs and Logistics, Mr. John White, have each spoken highly of the success of the all-volunteer military force. I ask that their respective statements as reported in the Atlanta Constitution, the Colorado Springs Sun, and the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD following the balance of my remarks.

Mr. President, before embarking on any expansion in the authority of the Selective Service Agency, or the establishment of a national registration program of 18 year olds, we would do well to consider and challenge the premises underlying current force levels and examine their relation to actual defense requirements. As this has not been done by either the administration or the Congress (outside of hearings on the matter), I would suggest that we are adding to the waste of taxpayers' money in having a system functioning without the necessary induction authority to carry out the draft.

Finally, Mr. President, reflective of the hysteria which has led to some congressional calls for a resumption of the draft, I want to quote from a report which served as the basis for hearings on the all-volunteer military force entitled "Achieving America's Goals: National Service or the All-Volunteer Force?" written by Mr. William King. Mr. King's study in arguing for a return to the draft asserts that the volunteer force "is essentially a peacetime concept." Perhaps I am mistaken, Mr. President, but I have assumed that it is precisely because we have been at peace that we initially went to the all-volunteer force. Am I to believe that this country is not in peacetime, and therefore, the need for a return to the draft?

Mr. President, I contend that the calls for a return to the draft reflect the saber rattling of the Cold War era and have little relationship to our true defense requirements. If this Nation is not at war, and I have no reason to believe it is, then I must conclude that there is no reason to return to a draft.

I trust that any efforts to move us in this direction will be defeated in the Appropriations Committee today, and on the Senate floor during the debate on the HUD appropriations bill.

MILITARY MANPOWER CHIEF SEES NO NEED FOR DRAFT

(By George C. Wilson)

The post-Vietnam experiment of trying to fill the ranks of the peacetime military entirely with volunteers is working so well that there is no need for the draft in sight, according to the Pentagon's manpower chief.

Dr. John P. White, in taking that position during an interview with the Washington Post, dismissed the recent political talk about returning to the draft as "more smoke than fire."

Even with the upcoming sharp drop in the nation's population of 18 year olds, White said, the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps should be able to keep filling their ranks with volunteers.

A shortage of 18-year-old males, he said, could be offset by taking more females into the services.

Other responses planned, he said include reducing the dropout rate within the services and inspiring more people in the service to reenlist.

Although several lawmakers have recently been warning that the "all-volunteer force" is not working and some kind of compulsory national service may have to be legislated, White countered that such suggestions fly in the face of hard numbers.

In contrast to the mid-1950s when the armed services took 75 percent of the eligible 18-year-old males, White said, today they need only about 20 percent of them. Reasons for this include a smaller infantry—2 million on active duty in 1978 compared to 3.3 million in 1954; longer enlistments; a larger teen-age population to draw from, and more women in the ranks.

The services should not have to recruit a significantly higher percentage of the 18-year-old males between now and 1985, White said. He predicted the total recruited would still be close to the current 20 percent of those eligibile. (The United States had 1.8 million militarily eligible 18-year-old males in 1977 and is expected to have 1.6 million in 1985.)

White and his Pentagon colleagues have declared war on the dropout rates of the services to reduce the need for new volunteers. The Army, for example, saw 42 of every 100 men who signed up in 1974 drop out before finishing their obligated tours. New goals to reduce attrition have been set for all the services.

"There are several things" driving demands to return to the draft, White said, despite what he considers the proven success of the volunteer system.

"One, which is a legitimate social issue, is the question of whether or not people have an obligation to serve in some way.

"If you really look at that, it comes back down to some kind of national service" for young Americans that would require creation of additional government service agencies to absorb the young people the military could not use.

Or, to put it another way, "back to the CCC," the Civilian Conservation Corps established by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to combat unemployment during the Depression.

Critics of the all-volunteer force, White said, tend "to hold it up for comparison against some poorly defined but clearly better system. The impression is that there is always an alternative that will work better. * * *

"If you give us more people" by going back to the draft, White continued, "you're going to shorten the tour length. If you shorten the tour length, I'm not going to be able to train them as well."

White acknowledges there are problems in the all-volunteer force. "You bet your life we have" them, he said. "Anybody who recruits between 350,000 and 400,000 people a year is going to have problems." Congress could help the Pentagon with these problems by approving legislation for managing the force better, such as more flexibility in giving bonuses to service people, White said.

Chairman John C. Stennis (D-Miss.) of the Senate Armed Services Committee has referred to reported shortcomings of the all-volunteer force in urging that alternatives be considered.

A yearning for "the good old days" is another part of the political impetus for going back to the draft, White believes.

White, who was a lieutenant in the Marine Corps from 1959 to 1961, said, "I am bemused by surveys and TV shows from Europe which quote captains of the infantry as saying the Army isn't like it was during the draft. The captain talking wasn't in the Army when we had a draft. He's never seen anything but a volunteer soldier." (Draft calls ended in December 1972.)

Also, said White, some people want to return to the draft to obtain a bigger U.S. military force. "As I go around" talking about the all-volunteer force, said White, I hear that "it isn't big enough."

However, given the statistical and political realities, "the press is overplaying 'here comes the draft' " stories, White said.

"When you translate those legitimate concerns" about the current all-volunteer force "into registration and conscription," the political sentiment for shifting back melts away, he said.

The toughest test ahead for the all-volunteer force will come between 1985 and 1990 when the 18-year-old population dips.

Asked if he expects the draft to be reinstituted during his scheduled four-year tour of duty at the Pentagon, barring war, White replied without hesitation:

"No, I do not. I do not see either any need nor any sentiment for it. There's more smoke than fire."

BROWN UNCERTAIN ABOUT FUTURE OF ALL VOLUNTEER MILITARY FORCE

SEATTLE (AP).—Defense Secretary Harold Brown said Thursday he feels optimistic about the all-volunteer military force, but is uncertain about its future.

"So far, in peacetime and in an economy operating at less than full employment, it is working," Brown said.

But, the Pentagon chief added, "we don't yet know for sure" whether an adequate volunteer-based military force can be maintained when civilian jobs become plentiful and when a declining youth population reaches military age in the 1980s and 1990s.

And Brown forecast more acute competition from private industry for technically trained personnel needed to operate increasingly sophisticated military equipment.

Brown's appraisal of the five-year-old all-volunteer service came in a speech prepared for delivery to graduates of the University of the Pacific College of Dentistry in San Francisco.

The speech followed by two days Sen. Sam Nunn's assertion that "there is growing consensus that the all-volunteer force * * * may fail to provide an adequate foundation for the future national security needs of our nation."

The Senate Armed Services Committee, at the Georgia Democrat's behest, has ordered the Pentagon to study alternatives.

Without specifically noting Nunn's criticisms, Brown said the armed services are managing to achieve 96 percent of their recruiting goals while maintaining forces at about 2.1 million men and women. This, he said, "approaches the minimum needed for our national security."

The defense secretary also said fears that the volunteer service would become a "poor man's force" of questionable quality "had not been realized."

"Analysis to date suggests that the armed forces today * * * are a reasonable reflection of the population of the United States—perhaps a bit less so than under the draft," Brown said. He added that various indicators of quality are mixed.

"We are obtaining high-school graduates in adequate numbers for the most part, although the number of recruits in the highest mental categories is not so great as previously," Brown said.

"We have problems recruiting and retaining for some technical skills and some less attractive positions," he added. "But discipline and morale in general appear to be higher than under the draft. Commanders tell me that their troops are the best ever."

Brown acknowledged, however, that the National Guard and Army Reserve forces constitute another problem. He said "our ability to attract volunteers for the reserve units . . . has not been entirely satisfactory."

Brown also said a number of measures are being taken to improve the attractiveness of military service in both the active and reserve components, and that women are being given an increasingly wider role.

But, the defense secretary added, "I see no likelihood of removing" restrictions against women serving in direct combat roles.

"TOO EARLY" TO DISCREDIT VOLUNTEER ARMY: ROGERS

It is too early to call the volunteer Army a failure, Gen. Bernard W. Rogers, Army Chief of Staff, said Friday in a news conference at Fort Carson.

Gen. Rogers, who was commander of Fort Carson from September 1969 to December 1970, said the Army is in good shape as far as the number and quality of active troops is concerned. The problem, he said, is that the Army Reserve and the National Guard are short of men.

The government should extend some of the same benefits that have been successful in getting men into the Army to men considering the reserves, Gen. Rogers said. These benefits should include enlistment bonuses for recruits joining reserve units that would be called up early during an emergency, he said.

Educational assistance—$2 from the government for every $1 a soldier saved for his future education—should also be offered reservists, Gen. Rogers said.

He said the active units are getting both the quantity and quality of men needed under the volunteer Army system. Despite what some reports might lead one to believe, he said, the soldiers in the volunteer Army are "winners."

"These troops are among the best soldiers I've served with in my 35 years in the service," Gen. Rogers said.

Gen. Rogers said criticism of President Carter made by recently retired Maj. Gen. John Singlaub was not justified.

Gen. Singlaub has attacked the president for ignoring the advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Gen. Rogers said he had a better view of the situation because, unlike Gen. Singlaub, he had attended the meetings between the Joint Chiefs and the president.

"President Carter had met with the Joint Chiefs an unprecedented number of times," he said. "He doesn't always take our advice, but he listens."

Gen. Rogers said he was pleased to see the progress that had been made at Fort Carson since he was commander there. He noted there had been progress in replacing the World War II-era barracks with new living quarters and said that, by 1980, Fort Carson would be one of the finest bases in the Army.

One never uses "never" in the Army, he said, and so he could not say Fort Carson would never be closed down.

"I am a betting man, however, and I would bet the base will be open for a long time to come," he said.●

ALASKA LANDS: A PRIORITY FOR THE 95TH CONGRESS

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, at this time each year we all start thinking of which issues and bills we hope the Senate will consider before the Congress adjourns. While we have acted on many important issues this Congress, much work remains to be done.

In deciding what legislation to take up in the time remaining, I think it is very important that we look to the American people to make sure we are aware of what they consider to be priorities for the 95th Congress. A recent editorial from the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Press states very clearly what is on the minds of many of my constituents:

The U.S. Senate is confronting a very busy calendar. With the labor "reform" bill out of the way for at least the time being, there remain the nation's big four concerns to be faced up to: tax reform, energy, inflation, and unemployment. A fifth major consideration—the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act—demands Senate action this year as well.

Mr. President, there are other indications that many Americans are thinking about an Alaska lands bill in 1978. A recent poll by Louis Harris found that an amazing 32 percent of the citizens contacted were aware that Alaska lands legislation is pending in Congress, and of those 32 percent, an overwhelming 67 percent favored passage of such legislation.

Consider also the vote earlier this year in the House of Representatives. An overwhelming majority of our colleagues in the House—277–31—voted to pass H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. The Members of the House certainly would not have acted so decisively on this complex issue if they did not believe a strong Alaska lands bill was what the people want.

Finally, Mr. President, Alaskans, too, are calling for a bill this year. A recent editorial from an Alaskan newspaper, the Tundra Times, speaks of the need to end uncertainty over the land legislation so that the State can get on with building an economically secure future.

The editorial states:

. . . prolonging the uncertainty over this federal land legislation can only add to the deep-rooted pessimism one now finds throughout Alaska's economic community. Far more than large parks and wildlife refuges themselves, which will have positive economic value for the state, delay in drawing final park and refuge boundaries will only keep the brakes on Alaska's post-pipeline efforts to build financial stability and security for the future.

Mr. President, there is no question in my mind that passage of a strong Alaska lands bill—this year—is what the American people want. For that reason I am pleased to be a cosponsor of S. 1500 (amendment No. 2176), the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. I urge my colleagues to take to heart the sentiments of the American people and place passage of a strong Alaska lands bill high on their list of priorities for the 95th Congress. To do less would be to ignore our responsibilities as representatives of the people.

Mr. President, the essential text of the editorial from the Grand Rapids Press, dated June 30, 1978, follows. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD:

THE ALASKAN LAND BILL

The U.S. Senate is confronting a very busy calendar. With the labor "reform" bill out of the way for at least the time being, there remain the nation's big four concerns to be faced up to: tax reform, energy, inflation and unemployment. A fifth major consideration—the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act—demands Senate action this year as well.

Under the Alaskan Statehood Act, the 49th state was granted 105 million federal acres, or about 28 percent of the available land and water, when it entered the Union. Selection proceeded slowly and was interrupted by litigation, most notably the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act of 1971 which gave Eskimos, Aleuts and Indians millions of dollars in grants and mineral rights plus 44 million acres of land.

In consideration for removing legal barriers to the construction of the Alaskan pipeline, conservationists insisted that Congress set aside "national interest" lands to provide for national parks, wildlife refugees and wilderness areas. Under section d-2 of the Native Claims Act this was to be accomplished no later than Dec. 18, 1978.

No amount of acreage was specified, however, and Congress has been debating that question off and on ever since. Last month, by a margin of 277–31, the House of Representatives set aside 124 million acres—an area roughly equal to the size of California. President Carter has recommended 92 million acres. The state of Alaska thinks that 25 million acres are enough.

It is in the Senate that the future of Alaska will be determined. Unless that body acts by the December deadline the government in Juneau may resume claiming the balance—or 30 million acres—of the 105 million acres to which the state is entitled.

Among the traditions still largely observed in "the highest deliberative body in the world" is senatorial courtesy. The unwritten understanding provides that in matters bearing directly on a senator's home state his colleagues will defer to his wishes. In this case, both Democrat Mike Gravel and Republican Ted Stevens have united to oppose large "withdrawals" of land to protected status. They want much more territory left open for economic development.

But even if a majority of senators choose to ignore senatorial courtesy, there is another danger to the proposals advanced by the administration and the House-passed set-aside. That danger is a filibuster led by the Alaskans.

At this point it is clear that Sen. Donald Riegle would be a party to neither senatorial courtesy nor a filibuster. He is co-sponsoring a bill which sets aside 110.5 million acres. This in itself is a significant breakthrough for it is the first time the Flint Democrat has lent his name to environmental legislation.

By far Alaska is the nation's largest state. Its 365 million acres of land and 10 million acres of inland waterways account for one-fifth the area of the United States. Its wildlands are unmatched anywhere in North America. This gift of nature is a national treasure to be jealously guarded and preserved.

When Alaska became a state, more than 99 percent of its territory belonged to the federal government. In granting statehood, Congress' offering of 105 million acres of land and water to the people of Alaska was most generous. Indeed it was the largest federal land transfer to any state in the Union, greater in fact than all past grants west of the Missouri combined.

Since then the Senate has been very helpful to the development needs of Alaska. It has expedited oil and gas pipelines, granted the most valuable development land (such as Prudhoe Bay) to the state in the 105-million acre Statehood Land Grant, and resolved the "freeze" on lands settling the Native land claims.

Now, however, it is appropriate that the Senate act in the best interests of all Americans—not just Alaskans—for it is they who own the territory in question. A strong Alaskan bill is owed this nation's future generations.●

GOOD REASONS FOR GOLD MEDALLION

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, recently a newspaper column in the New Haven Register was brought to my attention, which defines briefly and clearly the purpose of the Gold Medallion Act of 1978, a bill I have cosponsored with Senator JESSE HELMS and others. After having to plow through all the verbiage that usually accompanies the justification for a piece of legislation, it was good to come across this succinct, brief account of what we are trying to accomplish with that bill.

This is a bill that should be passed and I will do what I can to see that the bill is given the consideration it deserves as soon as possible.

The author of the column, Mr. John Chamberlain, states simply that it is unfair that Americans cannot buy American gold, that Americans need protection against depreciating paper money as much as "any gnome from Zurich or any sheik in Saudi Arabia," and that the Gold Medallion Act of 1978 would help alleviate these problems.

Mr. Chamberlain is a journalist of vast experience. Now a columnist for King Feature Syndicates, in his long career he has been a dean of the Troy, Ala. School of Journalism, a lecturer and associate professor at the Columbia School of Journalism, an editor of Life magazine, and a contributor to Harper's Bazaar, Barron's, and the Wall Street Journal, among others. He has written several books, including "Fanfare to Reform," "The Roots of Capitalism" and "The Enterprising American—A Business History of the United States."

Obviously, Mr. Chamberlain is a man of great economic sophistication. He has undoubtedly carefully analyzed all available information to reach his conclusions about the Gold Medallion Act. I know that much good information has been put out by the Institute on Money and Inflation. IMI is an important new source of economic analysis, facts, and figures. It is about time that Congress begins learning about sound money, and how we can restore a stable currency.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Chamberlain's article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

U.S. CAN SELL GOLD MEDALLIONS

The U.S. Treasury has been presented with a plan to help save the dollar by selling small amounts of gold from its 277-million-ounce Fort Knox hoard at periodic intervals. In present—circumstances if Washington were to auction some 400,000 ounces at $160 an ounce once every month to foreigners for Eurodollars, it would help tip the scales of our deteriorating balance-of-payments position.

The idea of soaking up paper Eurodollars is a good one, but it obviously discriminates against stay-at-home Americans who need protection against depreciating paper money as much as any gnome from Zurich or any sheik from Saudi Arabia.

True enough, the stay-at-home would benefit indirectly from the Treasury sales, for they would keep the price of gold from skyrocketing before he could put in his bid for rand coins from South Africa. The sale of gold medallions from the U.S. Treasury direct to citizens would be a matter of convenience, which would be appreciated by value-conscious voters.

The Treasury has always been loath to accommodate ordinary U.S. citizens. It took some doing to get a right-to-own-gold clause through Congress in the first place. Later, after some clever parliamentary footwork by Sen. Jesse Helms of North Carolina, Congress agreed to legalize contracts specifying payments in gold by consenting adults. The then Secretary of the Treasury William Simon, and Arthur Burns, boss of the Federal Reserve Bank, finally agreed to withdraw objections making a gold clause optional in contracts. But it is still hard to get hold of gold in the United States in easily understood and easily handled shapes. So what next?

One of Sen. Helms's aides who happens to be blessed with a sense of humor suggested that the Treasury should make available to the people gold medallions known as the Hubie and the Half-Hubie. His idea is that a gold coin bearing the likeness of the late Sen. Hubert Humphrey would give it a Populist sanction. Of course, there is no likelihood that the Senate, a sober, body, would ever kid around with Humphrey's memory. But even such a chronic inflationist as Hubert himself might have seen the value of letting the average American have parity with a Zurich gnome or an Arab sheik when it comes to letting gold be held as a hedge against the inconsiderate or hasty acts of back scratching politicians.

In any case, Sen. Helms is now busy with a bill, the Gold Medallion Act of 1978, to provide for the issue of gold medallions. The medallions would be sold, on order of the secretary of the treasury; in one ounce and half-ounce sizes. The one ounce medallion "shall have on its face the likeness of the Statue of Freedom atop the dome of the Capitol Building, surrounded by laurel leaves." The word "freedom" would be inscribed above the likeness, and the words "one ounce of fine gold" would be placed inside the edge of the medallion. The half-ounce medallion would be inscribed with the words, "Human Rights." Liberals who refuse to accept the idea that the right to hold easily negotiable gold coins is a human right might be mollified by the thought that a domestic supplier of gold medallions would help destory the market for gold rands from South Africa, a country that is growing in disfavor with leftists who insist on making symbolic protest against the institution of apartheid. Not that it really makes much difference where gold originates. But symbolic protests make their point—and the Helms Gold Medallion Act of 1978 would do double duty in satisfying symbol hunters of both the Right and the Left.●

THE UNPERSUASIVE BAKKE DECISION

● Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, the Supreme Court has recently handed down a rather two-sided opinion in the case of University of California against Allan Bakke. While the Court ruled that Allan Bakke had been unfairly discriminated against because of his race, the Court also decided that race could be used in making admissions decisions.

This decision, though it may be hailed by some as statesmanlike and diplomatic, appears to lack the rational, objective constitutional arguments characteristic of a Court which is above public opinion.

It appears that the Court has interpreted the 14th amendment to allow a measure of reverse discrimination. So-called affirmative action programs, which are intended to eradicate racial discrimination are in themselves discriminatory. The purpose of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was to guarantee equal rights to all persons, and equal rights means that each person should have the opportunity to be judged on the basis of his or her personal merits, and not by skin color. I personally believe the Constitution is colorblind when it states that no person shall be denied equal protection of the laws.

Mr. Robert Bork, Chancellor Kent professor of law at Yale University Law School has written a very insightful analysis of the Bakke decision questioning whether or not the Court "adequately discharged its constitutional function" in the Bakke decision.

I ask that Professor Bork's article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 21, 1978]

THE UNPERSUASIVE BAKKE DECISION

(By Robert H. Bork)

The hurricane of learned and semi-learned commentary that followed instantly upon the Bakke decision reminds us once more that the Supreme Court of the United States is probably the most superficially discussed major institution of government.

We learned the views of civil rights leaders, constitutional lawyers, administrators in government and in education, both before and after they had actually read the opinions, about what the case portends for affirmative action or reverse discrimination. The court's opinions, six in all, were skillfully analyzed in the mass media from every conceivable perspective—except the perspective that is ultimately crucial: whether the court, whatever the political acceptability of its results, adequately discharged its constitutional function.

The press encourages the public to judge the court only by the political assessment of results. But in democratic theory, the court's power must be justified by constitutional reasoning. As Alexander M. Bickel said, "The process of the coherent, analytically warranted, principled declaration of general norms alone justifies the court's function." Otherwise, "its insulation from the political process is inexplicable." That is the old faith at least, and we do not have a coherent alternative to replace it. In Bakke, the court paid it tribute by producing, all told, 154 pages of legal argumentation. It is time we examined the case less for its practical wisdom and more for the legitimacy of its sources.

The decisive opinion was Mr. Justice Powell's, because the remainder of the court split evenly for and against the racial quota used by the Davis medical school for admissions. Justice Powell's middle position—universities may not use raw racial quotas but may consider race, among other factors, in the interest of diversity among the student body—has been praised as a statesmanlike solution to an agonizing problem. It may be. Unfortunately, in constitutional terms, his argument is not ultimately persuasive.

THE 14TH AMENDMENT MEANS?

The 14th Amendment, centered historically on problems of race, guarantees equal protection of the laws to "persons." Bakke and his allies argued that it requires colorblindness, equality of opportunity unhindered by law, while proponents of affirmative action contended that it means equality of outcomes, and so permits states to favor blacks and other minorities until they achieve proportionally equal number in universities and elsewhere without the aid of official preference.

Justice Powell attempted to find a position between these two by tempering a colorblind version of the 14th Amendment with the First Amendment. The fourteenth, he said, is strict about any use of race: "The guarantee of equal protection cannot mean one thing when applied to one individual and something else when applied to a person of another color. If both are not accorded the same protection, then it is not equal." The use of such classifications requires strict judicial scrutiny, and only the most compelling governmental interests can justify them.

Davis, however, had advanced one such interest: ". . . the attainment of a diverse student body. This clearly is a constitutionally permissible goal for an institution of higher education." It is an aspect of "academic freedom" and so a "special concern of the First Amendment."

The upshot is that Davis' quota violates the law, and Bakke must be admitted, because the school focused solely on race rather than seeking a "genuine diversity." When genuine diversity is sought, race may be one of the factors accorded preference.

There may, at first glance, seem something appealing about this. The courageous and badly treated Bakke goes to medical school next fall, the hard-core racists of reverse discrimination are defeated, but a softer policy of affirmative action, at least in universities, is left some breathing space. As politics, the solution may seem statesmanlike, but as constitutional argument, it leaves you hungry an hour later.

The trouble is, it is hard to take seriously the idea that the First Amendment permits university freedom from the strictures of the fourteenth so long as they pursue an educational policy held in good faith. Were that true, a university could believe that education is more effective under conditions of genuine homogeneity and so count against applicants, among other factors, the fact of being black, female, Chicano, etc. Nobody supposes for a moment that such a policy, however sincerely adopted, would be shielded by the First Amendment from the fourteenth.

But if it is not, Justice Powell's use of the First Amendment fails; it is not a real factor and we have at bottom a statement that the 14th Amendment allows some, but not too much, reverse discrimination. Yet that vision of the Constitution remains unexplained. Justified neither by the theory that the amendment is pro-black nor that it is colorblind, it must be seen as an uneasy compromise resting upon no constitutional footing of its own.

Mr. Justice Brennan's opinion for the four-member bloc that approved racial quotas fares no better. It turns upon a startling analogy.

A company that discriminated may be required to restore blacks to seniority wrongfully denied, even though that injures whites not responsible for the discrimination. It is equally proper, the argument runs, to note that the entire society has discriminated against blacks and to conclude that institutions, such as the Davis medical school, may provide a remedy by admitting blacks in preference to better qualified whites. The white employees who lose seniority are not really damaged since, absent the discrimination, the blacks in question would have been ahead of them on the list anyway.

Justice Brennan concludes: "If it was reasonable to conclude—as we hold that it was—that the failure of minorities to qualify for admission at Davis under regular procedures was due principally to the effects of past discrimination, then there is a reasonable likelihood that, but for pervasive racial discrimination, (Bakke) would have failed to qualify for admission even in the absence of Davis' special admissions program."

Even granting the speculative premise, we cannot know which individuals under a hypothetical national history would have beaten out Bakke. Justice Brennan appears to mean, therefore, that the particular individuals admitted in preference to Bakke on grounds of race are proxies for unknown others. Bakke is sacrificed to person A because Davis guesses that person B, who is unknown but of the same minority race as A, would have tested better than Bakke if B had not suffered pervasive societal discrimination. A is advanced to compensate for B's assumed deprivation, and Bakke pays the price. The argument offends both ideas of common justice and the 14th Amendment's guarantee of equal protection to persons, not classes.

THE TACTICS OF THE MINORITY

The remaining four Justices, in an opinion written by Mr. Justice Stevens, adopted a tactic that would have been quite useful had they been a majority but was less so in their tactical position. They decided that racial quotas were outlawed by Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which, unlike the other five Justices, they said did not merely follow the court's interpretation of the 14th Amendment, and they refused to give advice about other forms of racial preference not before the court. Had this been an opinion for the court, the ruling would have had the distinct advantage of placing the reverse discrimination issue on the political agenda of the nation unencumbered by the moral weight of a constitutional interpretation. "Focusing attention on constitutionality," as Justice Frankfurter said, "tends to make constitutionality synonymous with wisdom." When the democratic process had chosen a policy, it would have been time enough for the court to measure it against the Constitution.

As a minority position, however, reliance on Title VI accomplishes little. It has no dramatic impact, and the fact that the five Justices who spoke to the broadest constitutional issues endorsed, in different degrees, government classifications by race skews the political process in favor of reverse discrimination and may abort full political consideration of the issue altogether.

If so, universities have been ratified in a daring social policy by a court majority. (Justice Powell's rule may not prove remarkably different in action from Justice Brennan's, for it does not allow for the hypocrisy of many universities in this area. Race will be taken into account, and educators' candor may suffer more than quotas. The merits of the social policy aside, the court's constitutional warrant for authorizing it was not displayed in the Bakke opinions. A press which regards itself as a guardian of democracy ought to make that fact quite as much the focus for discussion as the ruling's impact upon affirmative action programs.●

TRADE EMBARGO ON UGANDA

● Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to extend the debate on the Weicker-Hatfield amendment which passed the Senate last Friday—July 28—and would mandate a trade embargo on Idi Amin's Uganda. In so doing I want to clarify the Record confused by the Sunday—July 30—Washington Post article on this issue written by J. Regan Kerney. Since no reporter consulted with me or any of the other prime sponsors of boycott legislation—Senator WEICKER, Congressman PEASE, and Congressman BONKER—it is urgent for all to know that the inference of reprisals by Amin against Americans while not totally outside the realm of possibility has been responsibly anticipated and guarded against.

Congressman DONALD PEASE's office undertook the responsibility of writing all of the missionary organizations which have personnel in Uganda. I am submitting to the RECORD copies of that letter, three typical responses of the many received, and the list of the agencies contacted.

The material follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 26, 1978.

Sister MAGDELIN WHELAN, Franciscan Sisters,
Foster Street,
Brighton, Mass.

DEAR SISTER MAGDELIN: To date, 75 congressmen have joined me in sponsoring legislation to end U.S. commercial trade with the government of Idi Amin in Uganda. In addition, several organizations including the National Coalition of American Nuns and the United Church Board for World Ministries of the United Church of Christ have endorsed the legislation. My purposes in writing you are twofold: 1) to apprise you of the likelihood of hearings on Uganda in the near future and 2) to ask you to briefly respond to a few questions of direct relevance to your personnel in Uganda.

Now that the legislation to establish a trade ban has been introduced in both houses of Congress, it is probable that hearings will be held in the near future. Plans have already been set in motion to have congressional staff organize a series of hearings to explore the current status of U.S.-Ugandan relations and to discuss options for changing our policies.

Since persons affiliated with your organization conceivably could be affected by a change in policy (i.e. enactment of a trade ban), I seek answers from you to the following questions.

1. Is it true that the State Department has repeatedly urged you to withdraw your personnel from Uganda? If so, why have you chosen not to do so?

2. Given that your personnel in Uganda assume certain risks and could be taken hostage as "political pawns" by Amin, what are the reasons for your policy of allowing them to remain?

3. The presence of your personnel in Uganda is the reason most often cited by the State Department for its refusal to support a commercial trade ban with Amin's government. Do you think the presence of your personnel in Uganda should be a dominant factor in government U.S.-Ugandan relations and in stifling efforts to end substantial U.S. commercial support for Amin?

4. If it became apparent that the presence of your personnel in Uganda is the decisive factor in determining congressional approval or disapproval of a commercial trade ban with Amin, would you then be willing to withdraw your personnel in Uganda?

5. Would it be possible for you to pass word to your personnel in Uganda to leave if a trade ban were imminent in such a manner as to allow those to leave who wish to and as not to provoke Amin?

I am very concerned about the well-being of all Americans in Uganda. Consequently, your insights and prompt consideration of these matters would be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

DON J. PEASE,
Member of Congress.

---

WHITE FATHERS OF AFRICA,
Plainfield, N.J., February 11, 1978.

Hon. DON J. PEASE,
Member of Congress, Longworth Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PEASE: I am in receipt of your letter of January 26th regarding the presence of White Father personnel in Uganda, and I will do my best to answer your questions.

1. To my knowledge, the State Department has never asked us to withdraw our men from Uganda. Even if they had asked us, we would not have withdrawn them. We have been in Uganda for over 100 years for plainly religious reasons and we have never been involved in politics. Our men have preferred to remain with the people and help them to live through the difficult moments of life. We have never been ones to wave the flag and be deported, so that we could make the headlines.

2. From my answer in question 1), you have the reasons why missionaries consider risks as a normal part of their daily lives. If we are to bring the true spirit of Christ to these people, we must not abandon them.

3. I do not think that the State Department should use the missionaries in any way as a pawn to stress their point in United States/Uganda relations. The presence of missionaries should not affect in any way U.S./Uganda politics or commercial relations.

4. We will never agree to withdrawing our men for political or commercial reasons.

5. Our men on the spot have the power to decide their own movements and make decisions for their own lives. It would not be possible nor advisable for me to influence them in one way or the other.

I think from these answers you can see how missionaries have managed to survive in Africa for over 100 years, and this is the policy which we will continue to maintain.

Yours sincerely,

REV. JOHN JOE BRAUN, W. F.,
Provincial, White Fathers—U.S.A.

FOREIGN MISSION BOARD OF THE SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION,
January 31, 1978.

Congressman DON J. PEASE,
Longworth Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PEASE: It was kind of you to write relative to your concern for missionary personnel in Uganda. I have discussed your letter with Dr. Davis Saunders, secretary for our mission work in East Africa.

Actually, our missionary staff in Uganda is very small, consisting of only two couples at present.

In keeping with long-standing policy of our board, missionaries in Uganda have repeatedly been assured of their freedom to make decisions at any time concerning their departing from or remaining in the country. They are given assurance of full support from our board in implementing those decisions. From time to time, they have withdrawn from the country during periods of special tension and have returned to their work when it seemed advisable.

Missionaries of our board devote themselves to ministries of Christian witness and service and do not become involved in the political affairs of the country in which they serve.

It is our point of view that Congress might well proceed with whatever legislation it deems advisable from the standpoint of our country and international consideration without the presence of the missionary being the determining factor.

Sincerely,

BAKER J. CAUTHEN.

JESUIT MISSIONS,
Washington, D.C., March 10, 1978.

Representative DON J. PEASE,
Longworth Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE PEASE: Your letter of January 26th has been awaiting a response for some time, principally since I have been out of the country since Christmas.

Consequently, my responses may be of little or no value at this time, but I can make them very briefly in any case.

To the best of my knowledge, there is only one American Jesuit in Uganda. The State Department has been in touch with our representative in New England (where the Father in Uganda comes from), but as far as I know it was not to urge that we withdraw that man from Uganda.

There are indeed risks taken by anyone who stays in Uganda, including the possibility that they could be used as "political pawns" as you mention in your letter. Any reasons we would have for retention of personnel in Uganda have no relation to either economic or political interests. Our personnel are there for the purpose of serving the local church and that priority becomes increasingly more important as things heat up in that country.

I do not think that the presence of any of our American personnel in Uganda should be a dominant factor in U.S.-Ugandan relations, least of all in stifling efforts to end substantial support for Idi Amin. You are aware, no doubt, that the persecution of church personnel (as happened recently in El Salvador and is happening in Rhodesia and Nicaragua and other places) will not see us remain silent.

It is hardly likely that the presence of any Jesuit personnel in Uganda would be a decisive factor in determining congressional action on a commercial trade ban. My own personal concern would be to inquire who would be the ultimate victims of such a ban. It is hard for me to imagine that the victims would be any other than the Ugandan peasants and hence the issue is rather complex

If a trade ban were imminent, I doubt very much that we would pass word to our one man there to leave. He has been there for many years and is quite capable of making his own decision in all prudence and common sense.

Many thanks for the esteem implied in your letter of inquiry and I hope that these answers are satisfactory, even though the extent of our personnel in Uganda is so minimal.

Sincerely yours,

SIMON E. SMITH, S.J.,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. In addition, Mr. President, as late as February, when it became apparent that congressional action was imminent, the State Department sent Telex messages through the West German Embassy to all Americans residing in Uganda urging them to leave. There are only 150 plus registered Americans left in the country; 100 are missionaries who have vowed to stay as long as possible no matter what the danger is to them personally. As you can see from the letters they do not want our policy considerations to be limited because of their presence in Uganda. The remaining 50 or so are representatives of American companies who are still doing business with Amin in spite of encouragement by congressional committees to cease. These people can be expected to have the freedom to leave shortly since this legislation, when enacted, will preclude the necessity of their presence in Uganda.

Further, the Post article suggested, as has the State Department over the months, that the trade embargo "will probably have little impact on Uganda anyway." The fact is that we have solid evidence from within the Amin government that they are having extreme difficulty in making up the markets already lost. Amin's Secretary of Commerce has been visiting Eastern European cities, searching for new purchasers, to no avail. If as anticipated, the British Parliament follows our lead in the matter of a trade embargo with Uganda it will be next to impossible for Amin's regime to rebound given the economic and political breakdown now occurring. As I have conveyed repeatedly to the State Department and the National Security Council, this "no effect" argument is reprehensible. How do we know for sure that an embargo would be ineffective? At the very least it would put action to our verbalized human rights intentions, and in so doing would be a witness to the world. A principled stand, in fact, has the potential of wide impact.

I am hopeful that further news articles will give full and fair coverage to the important issue of this trade embargo and its implications.●

On behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, notice is hereby given to all persons interested in this nomination to file with the committee, in writing, on or before Monday, August 7, 1978, any representations or objections they may wish to present concerning the above nomination with a further statement whether it is their intention to appear at any hearing which may be scheduled.●

TREASURY VIEWS ON GOLD MEDALLION—A REBUTTAL

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, recently I received a letter from the Treasury Department on the Gold Medallion Act of 1978, a bill which is something of a rarity, a bill which places no great burden on the Treasury Department, especially none on the taxpayers of this country, but one which seems to have aroused its great consternation among some associated with the Treasury Department.

Last Friday, the chairman of the Senate Banking Committee pledged early hearings on this bill. On May 3 of this year, I addressed a letter to Secretary Blumenthal and asked for any official or informal suggestions on my bill, S. 2843. The letter I received almost 2 months later was a dogmatic, predictable, and unfortunately inaccurate account of the bill and the relevant effects it may have.

Because a similar letter was sent to the chairmen of the House and Senate Banking Committees, I have sent a response to both Chairman PROXMIRE and Chairman REUSS. I believe that in the course of any consideration of this bill, the other side of Treasury's contentions should be aired.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my letter to Chairman PROXMIRE and Secretary Blumenthal's letter to me be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D.C., June 29, 1978.

Hon. JESSE A. HELMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HELMS: Thank you for your letter in which you asked for my views on S. 2843, authorizing the production by the United States Treasury of one ounce and one-half ounce gold medallions. After careful consideration of the provisions of the bill, and the reasons for your introducing the proposed legislation as stated in the Congressional Record of April 6, I have concluded that issuance of these gold medallions would be contrary to the public interest, and I could not support such action.

S. 2843 provides that, upon a determination by the Secretary of the Treasury to sell gold, such sales shall, in the first instance, be in the form on one ounce and one-half ounce gold medallions. The first 1.5 million ounces of gold to be sold in any fiscal year would be required to be sold in this form. The balance of gold sales could be in such a manner as the Secretary deems appropriate. The medallions, although they would not be legal tender, would have a typical style of U.S. circulating coins, with the Great Seal of the United States on one side. The medallions would be sold at a market-related price.

Among the stated purposes of this legislation are: (1) to make inroads into the current market for the South African Krugerrand, and similar gold coins; and (2) to provide all U.S. citizens a U.S. issued source of investment as a hedge against inflation.

In my view, the provisions of S. 2843 would be contrary to U.S. monetary and economic policy. First, I do not believe the U.S. Government should permit the erroneous impression to be created that it cannot or will not take the necessary steps to combat inflation and that the public therefore needs to buy gold as a hedge against inflation.

President Carter has recently announced a comprehensive anti-inflation program. The seriousness of our commitment to that program could be undermined by the minting and sale of gold medallions by the U.S. Government as a hedge against inflation. The theme that the purchase of such medallions or gold coins will provide an anti-inflationary hedge is being used extensively in advertisements of the Krugerrand, and indeed is one of the reasons you have stated for introducing the bill. The general public would naturally interpret the U.S. Government action of issuing these medallions in this way, and public confidence in the soundness of the dollar could be weakened.

Second, the U.S. Government should not take any action to encourage U.S. citizens to invest in gold, nor to suggest that gold is a sound way for U.S. citizens to invest their earnings. Gold is a speculative commodity, subject to highly volatile swings in price. Those who might purchase the medallions could sustain substantial financial losses. The Treasury cannot condone a proposal which would place the U.S. Government in the position of encouraging the public to make such investments.

Third, the proposal would be contrary to the U.S. policy to reduce the monetary role of gold. The Treasury Department did not object to the recent legislation allowing gold clause contracts (P.L. 95–147), because we believed that that step alone would not have an adverse effect on our policy of reducing the monetary role of gold. However, one reason you have given in support of S. 2843 is that the gold medallions sold by the United States would be a helpful adjunct to the legalization of gold clause contracts. You believe the medallions would be a convenient form in which to make payment in gold under those contracts. Thus, in effect, you intend for the medallions to function as coins, or a medium of payment.

I do not believe it is in the public interest for the U.S. Government to take an action which would encourage our citizens to use gold as a substitute for U.S. legal tender as a medium of exchange. Moreover, the issuance of such gold medallions could lead those who favor the return to a gold-based domestic monetary system to seek to make such medallions legal tender as the next step in a continuing process to restore the monetary role of gold.

In contrast to your proposal regarding U.S. sales of gold, the current U.S. Government policy is to sell gold to help meet import demand and to further reduce the monetary role of gold. The issuance of gold medallions by the U.S. Government would be a change in policy that would undoubtedly be misinterpreted by foreign governments and the market as a move toward enhancing the monetary role of gold.

For those reasons, I strongly believe that enactment of S. 2843 is not advisable and could seriously undermine our efforts to meet U.S. economic and monetary policy objectives.

Sincerely,

W. MICHAEL BLUMENTHAL.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., July 27, 1978.

Mr. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
Chairman, Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Recently you received a letter from the Treasury Department signed by Secretary Michael Blumenthal on the "Gold Medallion Act of 1978," S. 2843. Some observations on the Secretary of the Treasury's comments are in order and I hope they will encourage you to support the measure and schedule action on it in the near future.

First of all, I would like to point out a factual error. The letter states that the first 1.5 million ounces of gold to be sold in any fiscal year would be required to be sold in the form of gold medallions. A more careful reading of the text of the bill would have disclosed (in Sec. 3, part 2) that after the first year of gold medallion sales, in any fiscal year in which gold sales were held, the number of medallions to be produced and sold would be adjusted to meet the anticipated demand.

Later in his letter, the Secretary states that part of the current U.S. policy is, "to sell gold to help meet import demand." I chose the figure of 1.5 million ounces to be the amount of gold made into medallions in the year after enactment because in 1977 1.5 million ounces were imported—in the form of 1-ounce and ½-ounce bullion coins. The reason this gold was imported, is that the U.S. Treasury now disposes of its gold in 400-ounce bars. At $70,000 apiece, these gold bars are obtainable to only a very few Americans: people must look abroad for gold in smaller units.

One of Treasury's main objections to this bill is that it is concerned that if the U.S. Government issues gold pieces and if they are used as hedges against inflation, that might be an admission that the U.S. Government "cannot or will not take the necessary steps to combat inflation." A gold medallion or lack of it will not affect the credibility of the President's program anywhere near the effect of the President's economists predicting a 7.2 percent inflation rate for this year, 1.1 percent higher than the President had predicted in January. Not only that, they predict little improvement for next year. Treasury should look closer to home for threats to be credibility of the President's inflation-fighting efforts.

The Secretary's letter also states that this bill will weaken public confidence in the soundness of the dollar. Confidence in all currencies, not only the dollar, is already weak, or there would be less demand for foreign gold pieces in the first place. He cites gold as being a "speculative commodity, subject to highly volatile swings in price," and says that therefore the government should not encourage its citizens to buy it. This bill does not "encourage" gold purchases and I would oppose the government trying to artificially develop markets for its products, regardless what they are—medallions, stamps, bonds, publications or other things.

The Secretary is on soft ground when he dislikes the idea of a gold medallion because gold is subject to swings in price. I would not want to defend or encourage gold speculation, but the only "swings in price" affecting gold in recent years have been in the upward direction. In July of last year, gold was selling for $141.25 an ounce. Now an ounce sells for $194.20. By contrast, the U.S. dollar has been declining steadily in the international money market. A year ago the dollar used to purchase Deutsch Marks, Swiss Francs, and Japanese Yen, was worth an average of 20 percent more than it is today. Therefore, if Secretary Blumenthal is truly worried about U.S. citizens sustaining "substantial financial losses," he might want to urge people to stay away from the dollar.

The Secretary also expresses concern that were this bill to pass, that since the medallions could be used as a medium of exchange under gold clause contracts, they would necessarily function as money. Without debating the classical definitions of money (one of which is that it serve as a store of value—something dollars do not), a medium of exchange is not necessarily money. The medallions would clearly not be "legal tender." The gold in gold clause contracts can be viewed as merely a commodity, just as contracts denominated in wheat, potatoes, or pork bellies. Even if the U.S. government does not begin to issue medallions, gold in the form of Krugerrands, Austrian 100 Kronen, and Mexican 50 peso pieces will be available for use in gold clause contracts.

In any case, only dollars are legal tender and any gold medallions provided could be expected to change in price. The dollar is depreciating—a newly minted gold piece could change its dollar value in merely a matter of weeks.

Despite the contention of the Treasury's response that this bill is not in the "public interest", the public is most definitely interested in gold medallions. The Gold Medallion Act of 1978 would see that Americans could buy domestic gold, would provide additional Federal revenues from the sale, and would help meet import demand.

I hope you will see fit to schedule early action on this bill. It is important that this inequity in U.S. gold sales policy be cleared up.

Sincerely,

JESSE HELMS.

THE CONSUMER PRODUCT SAFETY COMMISSION—A "BATTERED AGENCY"

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, a June 10 article in the Nation entitled "The Case of the Battered Agency" is a constructive study of the Consumer Product Safety Commission. It includes a very convincing argument by Mark Green, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch, and David Moulton, an attorney at Congress Watch, of the need for certain changes in the Consumer Product Safety Commission's legislative charter, and I think my colleagues would benefit from having the opportunity to read this article since we will soon be acting on several proposed changes regarding the Commission. I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

THE CASE OF THE BATTERED AGENCY

(By Mark Green and David Moulton)

The Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC) is a case study in how to give good intentions a bad name. Launched five years ago on a wave of overwhelming legislative support and impeccable purpose, it has drifted and plunged to overwhelming unpopularity ever since. A business community that still thinks the government should stick to running toll roads has consistently criticized its regulatory performance. But so have many consumer groups, dismayed by its lack of productivity and focus. And so has the Carter Office of Management and Budget, some of whose staff—not unmindful of the antigovernment sentiment that helped Carter get elected—have urged in internal memorandums that the commission be abolished.

Ironically, at the very moment when criticism has coalesced to the point of threatening the very existence of the CPSC there is a genuine potential for reform and rehabilitation. The resignation of an unpopular chairman, its first Democratic majority, and some internal restructuring may yet resuscitate this comatose body. The outcome, however, is still in doubt. As one CPSC commissioner said of the agency's Congressional overseers after a recent hearing, "They trash us in one breath and raise us up in the next."

In 1968, President Johnson appointed the National Commission on Product Safety to "conduct a comprehensive study and investigation" of the risks of consumers of hazardous household products. The conclusions of this panel were startling: 20 million Americans injured each year in home as a result of incidents connected with consumer products; 110,000 permanently disabled; 30,000 killed; and an estimated cost to the nation in excess of $5.5 billion. The report found that "The exposure of consumers to unreasonable consumer product hazards is excessive by any standard of measurement," and recommended the establishment of a new, highly visible, independent product safety commission.

However, the business community and the Nixon administration opposed the unified agency approach, preferring a reorganization of existing programs within the Food and Drug Administration of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Congress brushed aside this effort to submerge and trivialize the problem of product safety; it approved a separate regulatory agency by a margin of 318 to 50 in the House and 69 to 10 in the Senate. But it then managed to design the commission in such a way as to snatch defeat from the jaws of victory, compromising the powers of the agency almost to the point of paralysis.

In most regulatory agencies, setting a standard involves the publication of a proposed rule, invitation of public comment, consideration of those comments, and promulgation of a final rule. Courts rarely overturn this process, upholding the agency's judgment except upon the unusual showing that the agency has acted "arbitrarily" or "capriciously."

Setting standards at CPSC differs from this norm in two crucial ways. First, before the agency can proceed on its own, it must by law solicit offers from nongovernment groups to write a proposed product safety standards. The theory behind this so-called "offeror process" is to insure public involvement in the standard-setting process. The result, though, has been substantial delay as the outside consumer or business group—which, in the first instance may lack technical prowess, or in the second, have a self-interest in weak criteria—struggles to develop the standard, only to have much of the work duplicated when the CPSC staff reviews the submitted proposal. Although the Consumer Product Safety Act specifically provides that the entire process shall take no more than 330 days, a recent investigation by the Government Accounting Office found that the three standards issued to date took an average of 834 days to develop.

Second, there is a legal test that the commission must satisfy to rebuff challenges in court by an affected industry. Mandatory standards promulgated by the commission must be justified by "substantial evidence," according to the Consumer Product Safety Act, and that is a higher degree of proof than merely demonstrating that a standard is neither "arbitrary" nor "capricious"—language that applies to nearly all other agencies. On March 3, 1978, a federal court invalidated the CPSC's standard on swimming pool slides, the first mandatory standard issued under the offeror process. The court expressed frustration at the "legislative anomaly" of requiring that the CPSC satisfy a higher standard of proof while at the same time delegating so much authority in the process to outside groups. A portion of the commission's matchbook standard suffered a similar fate only four weeks later. These two standards together account for more than four years of work and were designed to help prevent an estimated 10,000 injuries annually.

Exacerbating these designed-in defects have been severe personnel difficulties. The agency's first chairman was Richard Simpson, a former engineering consultant who was deputy assistant secretary for product standards at the Department of Commerce before being appointed by Nixon to the CPSC. Simpson, who had previously testified against the concept of an independent product safety agency in hearings before Congress, never hired a permanent executive director in his three years at the commission. "He tried to do everything himself, without bringing in the other commissioners," says one high agency official. "We knew nothing." Because of his inability to set priorities, outside petitions dictated the commission's work. The ill-fated swimming pool slide standard, for example, occupied the early years of standard setting at CPSC simply because it was the first petition accepted—which is not to say that dangerous swimming pool slides are desirable, only that they were not the most urgent product safety problem facing the embryonic agency.

After serving an initial two-and-a-half-year term, Simpson waited fruitlessly for months for reappointment. Instead, President Ford finally submitted the name of S. John Byington, who turned out not to have been worth the wait. As the deputy in President Ford's Consumer Affairs Office helping plan to defeat consumer protection agency legislation, Byington was bitterly opposed by consumer groups who saw him as a Ford crony steeped in business and politics. But after twice rebuffing Byington's nomination, the Senate surrendered to the presumption in favor of Presidential regulatory nominees and confirmed him 45 to 39.

Byington began his term in May 1976 by proclaiming that "the age of infancy at CPSC is over. Three years is long enough to get your act together." But before the curtain fell on him two years later, Byington managed to perform in a fashion that made Simpson look good by comparison.

Although the agency's budget of $40 million is the third smallest of all independent regulatory agencies, and tiny in relation to its broad jurisdiction. Byington recently admitted in a Senate hearing that 200 of his 900-person agency earned at least $28,755 last year. His year long reorganization project led to frequent charges of personnel abuse. An investigation by the Civil Service Commission carefully reported numerous instances of favoritism, misuse of consultants, and promotion of unqualified applicants. "Most of the violations . . . occurred as a direct result of actions taken or sanctioned by either Mr. Byinton or Mr. Dimcoff [a former CPSC management chief]," the report concluded. Dimcoff resigned in November 1977. In December a GAO study reiterated the litany of CPSC failure: inefficient management, misplaced priorities, lack of enforcement, delays from the offeror process, and very few standards actually issued.

Then, in January 1978, Byinton disclosed that the Justice Department was investigating allegations that a Los Angeles consulting firm, Terzian Associates, did free public relations work for him in return for government contracts totaling $17,000. Some high-level White House staff began discussing the possibility of attempting to remove Byington "for cause," a step no President had ever accomplished. Sen. Wendell Ford (D., Ky.), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee's Consumer Subcommittee, called for his resignation. Finally, blaming "political harassment" and keeping one step ahead of the sheriff and of clamoring Congressional committees, Byington announced that he was submitting his resignation from the commission effective June 30, four months before the expiration of his term.

After five years of Republican dominance, the CPSC seems ripe for a revival. President Carter has brought in two new Democrats as commissioners—Susan King and Edith Sloan—and reappointed a third, David Pittle. And Byington's resignation leaves the chair vacant.

This combination of appointments made and to be made, plus the prospect of legislative reforms in the offeror process, has been enough to encourage many CPSC critics to hope for a new dawn. After all, when the Carter administration dealt with the even less popular OSHA and EEOC, it chose reform over abolition, selecting strong chairwomen with the mandate to clean up their agencies. So why not the Consumer Product Safety Commission?

But some in the administration had other plans. On March 2, a group of White House and OMB officials met in the office of Harrison Wellford, director of the President's Reorganization Project, to discuss a draft memorandum by OMB staffer Stan Morris on the future of the CPSC. After noting that the commission would need reauthorizing legislation this year and that the chairman was leaving in July, the Morris memorandum proposed that "serious consideration should be given to abolishing CPSC and transferring its functions to other agencies." FDA would be assigned product safety activities, while EPA would be given carcinogenic (cancer-causing) hazards. Justification for this proposal was threefold: (1) "reduce the number of agencies," (2) "streamline federal health and safety activities," and (3) "help overcome the often criticized piecemeal bureaucratic regulatory image." Incredibly, nowhere did Morris discuss the prospects for achieving vigorous product safety regulation in one bureaucratic framework rather than another. Nevertheless, despite strong expressions by some participants that this was a politically dangerous attack on consumers, there was substantial sentiment in support of the proposal, and news stories of a White House move to kill CPSC began to appear. When one reporter later chided an OMB official for the administration's inability to cut down the size of the bureaucracy, he was told that OMB would soon move to abolish the CPSC and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

In one sense an effort to abolish or dismember this consumer agency should not have been entirely unexpected. An administration pledged to reduce thousands of agencies to 200 felt the pressure to begin demonstrating its anti-bureaucratic macho. And even during the debate last fall on the proposed Office of Consumer Representation, the long knives were being drawn. As Rep. Pete McCloskey stated on the House floor, "I only regret that we were not able under the germaneness rule to abolish the Consumer Product Safety Commission." Several other Members have since privately warned CPSC commissioners that they were considering moves to end the agency.

But those in Congress specifically charged with monitoring the agency had a different idea. Wellford and Rick Neustadt of the White House met with Senator Ford, and were told that anything less than a three-year authorization was unacceptable to him. On the House side, Reps. Bob Eckhardt (D., Texas) and John Moss, (D., Calif.) chairmen of Congressional committees that oversee CPSC, both expressed dismay at the timing of the proposal and fired off a joint letter to the President. "The agency needs and deserves an opportunity to function during the period in which it has a majority of commissioners who are both able and committed to the mission of the agency," wrote Eckhardt and Moss. "To dismember it would be premature and ill-advised, coming as it does at a time when a new leadership team capable of shaping an effective regulatory program is just beginning to assert itself."

In Senate hearings in early April, all five commissioners appeared before the Senate Consumer Subcommittee to make their own defense of the battered agency and to support the reauthorization. All agreed that anything less than a three-year reauthorization would demoralize staff, cut off needed research, and make it impossible to hire or keep talented people. Of course, there would also be an effect on the commissioners themselves, two of whom President Carter had recruited just weeks before to help turn the agency around. "When I was asked if I would serve on the commission," said newcomer Susan King, "I was asked by the White House to make a commitment—to a full seven-year term. It is somewhat of a surprise to see [the Carter administration's] interest in less than a three-year authorization. . . . It's like getting on the Amoco Cadiz when its going to ooze out from under you."

Nearly simultaneous with these hearings, a "decision" memo was being prepared for President Carter containing three options—dismantle, two-year authorization, or a three-year authorization. Although OMB would have been comfortable either with dismantling or a two-year authorization, consumer affairs adviser Esther Peterson argued strenuously in a memorandum to Carter for the three years. And Peterson, who within the week was to be given added authority by Carter to influence administration policy affecting consumers, prevailed. On Monday, April 24, on the eve of committee markup. Rick Neustadt called Senate and House staff to inform them that the President had decided to support the three-year option.

Without Carter's support, the CPSC would probably have either been splintered or subjected to a punitively brief reprieve. Even so, problems remain. The saber rattling that accompanied the debate on the Office of Consumer Representation is bound to be heard again as the CPSC reauthorization goes to full House and Senate for a vote. Those who wish to reduce the number of agencies in government, regardless of their mission, and those who wish especially to eliminate the ones that annoy business, have been altered by the debate within the administration. They may yet have an opportunity to capitalize on it.

And there remains the important matter of making a timely designation of a new chairman. The lack of one for any substantial time will put the commission in the same state of limbo that occurred between the chairmanships of Simpson and Byington. Yet White House sources say that Byington's successor is not expected to be named "for some time."

Rather than conveying such mixed signals, the Carter administration could better redesign and expedite the slow-motion, standard-setting process and designate a competent and dedicated chairman to replace Byington. For what is at stake here is not merely reshuffling some organizational boxes in Washington but the lives of tens of thousands of Americans, many children, who are being killed or permanently injured by shoddy products.

The commission still has the potential to reduce this suffering significantly, and indeed has done so in several instances to date. For example, child-resistant caps on packages containing poisonous or toxic substances, required by CPSC regulation under the Poison Prevention Packaging Act, are estimated to have prevented 40,000 poisonings since 1973. An estimated 4,500 injuries and 175 deaths have been avoided since 1974 as a result of CPSC regulations requiring that cribs be designed to minimize the chance that infants will suffocate between the mattress and slats.

Such regulation is a necessary supplement to a tort system that permits recovery, if at all, only after injury has occurred. Nor can we depend on the free market to produce the desired results. As Philip Elman, former member of the Federal Trade Commission, has said, "The answer, very simply, is that competition and voluntary actions of businessmen do not always suffice to safeguard the public interest. Competition does not inevitably take the form of a rivalry to produce the safest product. Indeed, the competition struggle may sometimes lead to a 'shaving' of the costs of manufacture involving some sacrifice of safety."

Thus, to kill the CPSC would be, effectively, to kill people. That is perhaps why the administration finally relented and agreed to a three-year reprieve for this struggling agency. It now has time to prove that government can be humane and efficient when the marketplace fails to protect consumers. But then, says Senator Ford, "They won't have to say anything to me about dismantling it if it hasn't performed. I will be the first to dismantle it myself."

TO HONOR THE MEMORY OF DR. CHARLES H. BEST

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, millions of individuals around the world who suffered from diabetes have had their lives saved and have enjoyed many years, because of the work and the dedication of the late Dr. Charles H. Best. We owe so much to two of our late Canadian friends, Dr. Best and the late Dr. Frederick Banting.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the obituary of Dr. Charles H. Best which appeared in the magazine Nutrition Today in its May/June 1978 issue. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article published in the same magazine in 1971 which is a report of an interview of Dr. Charles Best. He tells the fascinating story of the discovery of insulin.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHARLES H. BEST

Charles Herbert Best, M.D., D.Sc., research physician who helped save the lives of millions of diabetics because he was the co-discoverer of insulin, died at age 79.

Born in West Pembroke, Maine, 1899, Dr. Best was the son of a Canadian-born country doctor, and often made the rounds with his father in a horse and buggy. Dr. Best went to the University of Toronto to study arts, but his education was interrupted by military service in World War I. When he returned, he switched his area of study to physiology and biochemistry.

He was a 21-year-old undergraduate when he accepted an invitation from the late Dr. Frederick Banting to help isolate the hormone insulin, leading to the discovery that saved or lengthened the lives of an estimated 40 million diabetics around the world. Dr. Banting, at the time a 29-year-old orthopedist from London, Ontario, persuaded the late Dr. J. R. MacLeod, then head of the University of Toronto's physiology department, to lend him and Dr. Best a laboratory.

A third member of the team was Margaret Mahon, the future Mrs. Best, who was being courted by young Best at the time. They were married in 1924. In almost storybook fashion, this young woman urged and encouraged both men toward their mutual goal. In years to come, Dr. Best recalled, "Margaret was the only person other than the two of us, Banting and me, who knew the progress of the insulin investigation from day to day." When the time came to write the first paper on insulin, Margaret Mahon Best played a significant role; in fact, three pages of the original manuscript are in her handwriting.

For eight weeks in the summer of 1921 the two men lived in MacLeod's laboratory, unpaid, spending their own money for test animals and supplies, seeking a hormone secreted by the pancreas that stimulates the body to change sugar into energy. After weeks of watching their test animals die, the researchers injected a moribund dog with a substance extracted from a steer pancreas. The dog soon stood up and licked their hands. Six months later, a dying 14-year-old diabetic boy became the first human to control the disease with insulin.

After eighty positive experiments with insulin on dogs, Best and Banting presented their work to their scientific peers at a local meeting of the University of Toronto Physiological Society on November 14, 1921. Dr. Best tells of the excitement their report aroused.

"We hadn't intended any widespread publicity until we had made sure we could produce the insulin in sufficient quantities to treat patients. But there must have been a spy there. Some enterprising reporter picked up the story and it appeared in the newspapers next day in garbled fashion. The long-distance telephone calls started. Telegrams—which weren't at all usual in those days—poured in, as did thousands of pleading letters from diabetics all over the world."

Dr. Banting and Dr. MacLeod—because he was head of the department where the discovery was made—received the 1923 Nobel Prize. Dr. Banting, angry that Charles Best was overlooked, split his prize money with him. Dr. MacLeod said later, "I did not win the Nobel Prize for my discovery of insulin, but for my discovery of Best."

A CHAT WITH DR. CHARLES BEST

(By Richard M. Stalvey)

(Three articles about current knowledge of diabetes have been published in this series, so it was time to pay a visit to the renowned Canadian physician who participated in the discovery of insulin. The series will be completed with the publication of "The Dietary Management of Diabetes" in the near future. Notice: This material may be protected by Copyright Law (Title 17 U.S. Code).)

When Leonard Thompson died in a motorcycle accident in Toronto in 1937, newspapers around the world carried the story. The accident wasn't newsworthy, but Thompson was. For it was remarkable that Thompson had lived long enough to have the accident. Fifteen years before, while in a diabetic coma, he had been the first human diabetic to receive an injection of insulin.

To hear the story of the discovery of insulin firsthand and perhaps get a quick glimpse of what lies ahead in diabetes, I had several long talks with Dr. Charles Best. This is the report.

Fifteen-year-old Leonard was a diabetic. He was being treated with the only therapy available—a starvation diet, with the inevitable sequelae of wasting away, coma, and death.

Eight months earlier, two young scientists, Frederick Banting and Charles H. Best, concluded after long discussion that between them they had just the skills necessary to find the elusive substance that could cure diabetes, an affliction recognized by the ancient Greeks. By the beginning of this century there was a general conviction that the source of the problem lay in the pancreas. Best, a physiologist albeit yet without any graduate degree, (which had much to do with the subsequent distribution of the Nobel Prize), and Banting, a surgeon, were confident that together they could find a solution to the riddle of diabetes.

The two young men—Best was 22 and Banting 30—put their proposition to J. J. R. Macleod, professor of physiology at the University of Toronto, who was sufficiently impressed to give them laboratory space and the necessary animals upon which to experiment. They began working late in May 1921. Within a few months, applying deft surgery and thoughtful physiology, they isolated from the pancreas of several dogs a factor that, they believed, contained the essential anti-diabetes factor. They tested it on depancreatized—hence diabetic—dogs, and it worked. When the professor returned from vacation, Best and Banting could hardly wait to tell him of their results. They knew they were hot on the trail. When they took out the pancreas, the dog's blood sugar shot up; when they gave their purified extract, it dropped. Even more electrifying was the clinical improvement in the dogs. While Macleod was impresed, he advised caution. After 75 dogs had reacted uniformly, he appeared satisfied. The two young researchers then injected themselves, just to see if it were safe. The crudity of such experimentation would send shivers up the spines of today's cautious medical researchers. It would also send them to jail. In fact, one can't resist the speculation whether we'd have insulin yet if the present F.D.A. restrictions on medical research had been in force in 1922.

When he was satisfied that the material was safe, and without a word to the young researchers, Macleod took a bottle of the extract to the hospital. He gave it to the head of the diabetic service and suggested he try it on some patient in extremis. This head physician, in turn, passed the vial along to a young intern in what was later described as a very cursory manner. Looking around his ward, he had many very sick diabetics to choose from. He picked the fellow who looked the strongest, Leonard Thompson. The results were only mildly encouraging. The intern, being cautious, gave only half the vial and this he administered subcutaneously not intramuscularly as Best had done in the dogs. Not only did Thompson not get well right away, but a sterile abcess developed at the injection site. This was hardly an auspicious start. When the young researchers heard what had happened, they made a more potent extract, gave a large dose intravenously, and Leonard responded miraculously. This is just the way Charles Best told me the story.

So many things followed this event that, when you listen to Charles Best tell about them, it is hard to sort things out.

ONLY A BACHELOR

One thing I am curious to learn about was why the Nobel Prize in Medicine went to Macleod and Banting, when everyone speaks of Banting and Best as the discoverers of insulin. Easily understood, says Dr. Best. "At the time I had only a bachelor's degree. I was not yet a physician and the Nobel Prize people don't give awards to undergraduates." As Best says, "The Nobel Prize is carefully researched, very carefully researched. The process of finding the right person is very complicated. I was young and, quite frankly, I felt that Professor Macleod might have nominated me, but he didn't. I was quite disappointed, of course, but never bitter about it. I did get the public acknowledgment from Fred Banting and he gave me half his prize money. That was ten thousand dollars." He smiled and added, "I hope you won't be one of those people who tell me how much I'd be worth today if I'd invested that $10,000 in the stock of Eli Lilly in 1922."

This candor prompted me to ask more questions about the financial rewards of the insulin discovery. But there is something about the way Charles Best smiled when he heard a delicate question that told you a puckish answer was on the way. I asked anyway.

GOOD MOSELLE

"Well," he said, "when I started the work with Fred, I went off my fifty-dollar-a-month salary from the University of Toronto's research institute. It took us about three months to isolate the extract. When our discovery was accepted by the medical profession, the institute voted me the three months' back pay. So you might say I got $150." He paused and then as an afterthought added, "Oh, yes. After we picked Lilly to make insulin in the United States, we looked for a European manufacturer. Or rather they came after us. Hoechst was selected in Germany, and every year since then I have received six bottles of good Moselle wine from them."

Lilly apparently got the hugely profitable rights to insulin almost by accident. "The first paper we gave, the one at the Toronto meeting, wasn't submitted for publication right away, so we got up another paper and included all the work we'd done since then. We knew that the American Physiological Society was meeting at Yale in December, and we asked for a place on the program. The scientific director of Lilly, Dr. H. H. Clowes, was at the meeting and heard the paper. He was a good scientist and he seemed to be anxious for his company to make insulin. We gave them a license to make it for one year. That was almost 50 years ago, and they were only a small company then. Now look at them. They're one of the biggest in the world and insulin had a lot to do with it."

RETURNING VETERANS

We fell to talking about his early days. "Well, after Fred Banting came back from World War I, he set up a private surgical practice in London. I think the measure of his efforts, however, is indicated by the fact that he told me that it was 28 days before the first patient presented himself, and at the end of the first month he had four dollars on the books." The succeeding months were only slightly more fruitful, so Banting took a part-time job as demonstrator in anatomy and physiology at the newly developing medical school of the University of Western Ontario in London. Best, also a returning war veteran, was working on a master's degree in physiology at the University of Toronto and had managed to get some work at the University's research institute.

With a slight grin, Best said, "We both figured we couldn't do much worse financially, so when we hit upon the idea of going after the anti-diabetic factor, I readily agreed to work on the project. What I didn't know then was that the institute salary didn't go along with the new job."

Frederick Banting, who was later killed in a plane crash, recalled the story some years ago. "It happened that one evening I was preparing a lecture on the relation of the pancreas to diabetes. When the lecture was completed, I commenced the perusal of the newly arrived number of Surgery, Gynecology, and Obstretrics. This journal contained an article by Moses Barron in which he pointed out the analogy between the degenerative changes which follow the experimental litigation of the pancreatic duct and the blockage of the duct by gallstones. After reading the article I was unable to sleep." The next morning Banting talked with a number of the professors at the University of Western Ontario and requested laboratory space and facilities. Since the buildings for the medical school were still incomplete, he was advised to see Professor Macleod at the older University of Toronto.

PERSISTENT FELLOW

Best takes up the store here "Professor Macleod was understandably skeptical. He asked Banting what he hoped to accomplish when the best-trained physiologists had not succeeded in establishing or proving that there was and internal secretion of the pancreas. But Fred was a persistent fellow, and he persuaded Macleod to give him some laboratory space, ten dogs, and facility for doing blood and urine analyses. He also needed an assistant who could do the analyses since he was a surgeon, not a biochemist. Two of us volunteered. The scheme was that we'd each work four weeks out of the eight weeks Macleod had agreed to. We flipped a coin to see who'd take the first shift. I won. The other student—his name was, strangely enough, Nobel—decided not to join in, so I did the whole thing." Professor Macleod left for his summer visit to Scotland. On May 16, 1921, Banting and Best began their experiments. By July 27, they were ready to treat the first dog. "It wasn't really a dramatic result," Best recalled, "but it was enough to encourage us. Then, during August, we gave a dozen more injections and got dramatic results every time. It was about then that we really knew we had found the internal secretion. The dogs reacted beautifully. The blood sugar went down from four times normal to below normal. And the dogs obviously felt much better. The clinical improvement was as marked as the biochemical changes.

"In September we submitted our data to Macleod. But he was rather critical. Not too enthusiastic. We wanted to go on to new things, but he wanted us to keep on repeating our efforts. So we did . . . rather reluctantly, but I know now it was the right thing. We continued until we had 75 positive experiments without any failures."

Even then, Professor Macleod suggested a few more confirmatory steps. It wasn't until November 14 that the researchers were ready to present their work to their scientific peers. They chose a local meeting of the University of Toronto Physiological Society because they wanted to make certain that their work was acceptable to the scientific community before they let the public in on it. "We showed we had resurrected more than 80 dogs that were in all respects inevitably dying. We hadn't intended any widespread publicity until we had made sure we could produce the insulin in sufficient quantities to treat patients. But there must have been a spy there. Some enterprising reporter picked up the story and it appeared in the newspapers the next day in rather a garbled fashion. The long-distance telephone calls started. Telegrams—which weren't at all usual in those days—poured in, as did thousands of pleading letters from diabetics all over the world."

As Best recited the events of the days that followed his voice became more animated; even his visitor was caught up in the remembered excitement. "We, of course, had to get on with the job of purifying enough insulin to start treating humans. It was a hectic time and we were working night and day." I interrupted him to point out that he kept referring to the extract as insulin while his original notebooks used the term "isletin." "Insulin wasn't the word we first used. As early as August we were calling it 'isletin.' But Professor Macleod was rather insistent that the internal secretion of the pancreas was properly 'insulin.' Later on we found that Sharpey and Schaeffer of Edinburgh had suggested 'insulin' about 1910."

I asked him if it were possible that this question of terminology could be resonsible for the controversy over whether insulin had been discovered earlier by a Rumanian scientist. Best replied deliberately and emphatically, "There were more than twenty other people who had worked on insulin before us, and some of them got very interesting and significant results. Even Professor Macleod had tried to extract insulin many years before. But none of them convinced the world of what they had. This is the most important thing in any discovery. You've got to convince the scientific world. And we did. I wouldn't be surprised if there were a lot of things in the books right now that might be considered discoveries, but until the scientific world is convinced, you can't really recognize them."

EXPRESSMAN COMETH

Just at this moment, the expressman arrived to pick up the collection of trunk-sized luggage waiting in the hall. Dr. Best was off to South America for a series of anniversary lectures. With apologies from my host for having to cut our visit short, but with assurances that we'd take it up again after he had returned from Brazil, I left just as the trunks covered with stickers proclaiming millions of miles of travel, were carried out.

The few weeks I anticipated before the next interview stretched into months. Dr. Best came down with pneumonia this summer. When I heard of his illness and hospitalization, I was genuinely sorry, because our meeting had left me with a feeling of affection for this warm and charming man. It wasn't until early October that we were able to continue our talks.

Resuming where we had left off in the summer, I asked him what had been accepted and commercial production of insulin assured. Had he turned to the "new things" he had been so anxious to tackle when Professor Macleod had wanted them to proceed more cautiously? "Unfortunately, Fred apparently felt he'd have more freedom in another department, so he transferred to pharmacology. I went on to medical school. Afterward I continued to do research. One thing I worked on was stimulated by the depancreatized dogs that developed cirrhosis and fatty livers during the insulin experiments. My colleagues, Dr. Hersey and Dr. Huntsman, and I followed that up and we discovered a new vitamin, choline. For eight or ten years, I thought choline was the most important thing in the world. But we always managed to keep someone working on insulin in the department. That has gone on for the whole fifty years, except when I was in the Navy during the Second World War."

Whatever "injustice" may have been connected with the Nobel award, it certainly left no obvious bitterness, nor had disappointment dissuaded him from a very active career with many significant contributions to medical science. He held the Banting and Best Chair in Physiology, established in their honor at Toronto. He co-authored, with William Taylor, what is perhaps the best known and most widely used textbook of medical physiology. He taught thousands of young scientists and physicians. He continues, he said, to meet with young scientists from all over the world. "This gives me great pleasure. I lecture to the medical students, to the dental students, to the pharmacology students. I give lectures to students all over the world." I asked if he has any problem with the "generation gap."

CLEAN AND KEEN

"I think in my case, going back to 1921 when I was a student, there may have been a generation gap there. But as a teacher, I've never noticed it. It may have occurred sometime during my career. I couldn't be sure. But I enjoy talking with students now—they may be long-haired and have beards, but they're clean and they're keen. There were quite a few of my students at the meeting I went to today. Of course, some of them are already approaching retirement themselves. They're the cream of the world in diabetic research. I feel that we have more superbly trained young people working in the field than we ever had before. Too often though, I am afraid their research is not applied to the treatment of patients. For example, we should not overlook the benefits of good nutrition and good diets in managing diabetics. You can do quite a lot with a good diet in preventing atherosclerosis and other complications of diabetes. If you take good nutrition and antibiotics, and add them to the modern treatment of diabetes, the diabetic has a much better chance. I wish more diabetics and their families could go to the big clinics for instructions in diet. The child could go with its mother, or a married couple could go together if one of them has diabetes. In the course of two or three weeks, they could unravel the mysteries of the diabetic diet. It really should be a family affair. And diets can be made so that you can still eat well. Why, I had lunch today with a diabetic who has been on insulin for 49 years. He had roast beef, three boiled potatoes, carrots, and a piece of pumpkin pie. I don't believe he ate a roll. I know I didn't—and I sure didn't eat the pie." This last remark was made with a rueful grin, while he patted his waistline.

Dr. Best unhappily conceded that many practicing physicians are reluctant to recognize the importance of nutrition in medical practice. "One reason," he said, "is they may be a little bored with the subject. There's so much about it in the newspapers and magazines that their patients may even know more about it than they do. Of course, the dietitians are terribly interested in nutrition and it seems to be left in their hands, doesn't it? I know I have been in hospital for various things, and when the dietitian comes, she plans the diet and I don't think the physicians take as much interest as they should. I think that's true even among diabetic specialists, at least those that aren't in the big clinics. I try to put myself in the place of the general practitioner who has, say, perhaps ten diabetic patients. I can understand his problems. He can't take a lot of time for diet instructions. For example, my father, who was a country doctor, went to Toronto and took a course in insulin in 1922. He also learned about the diet for diabetics. He was very clever. But when he went home, he told his patients, 'eliminate most of the carbondydrates, take a low-calorie diet, don't eat too much, keep your weigh low' and that's about as far as he went. Except to give insulin, of course."

THE ONLY TREATMENT

Best's interest in diabetes was stimulated not by his father and his medical practice, but by another relative. "It was an aunt of mine. She was a nurse, and I was particularly fond of her. She got diabetes and the only treatment they had was the starvation diet. She went into diabetic coma and died in 1918 while I was away in the war. That was really what made me so interested in diabetes and so aware of what a terrible thing it was. Of course, I was greatly influenced in medicine by my father. It's funny, at first I was an arts major, but after the war I changed to science."

Like so many sons of doctors in those simpler days, Best often accompanied his father on his rounds. "He practiced in Pembroke, Maine, but he actually took his patients across the line to hospital in Canada. I even used to give anesthesia for him. I learned though that sometimes it was better for patients to give it to themselves. We don't have too many family doctors left today. We have one in Toronto who will come any time. It's very reassuring."

Dr. Best still spends as much time as possible at his summer home on the Maine shore where his father practiced and he grew up. The house in Pembroke where he was born was bought by the American Diabetes Association, and is maintained as a monument to the role he played in the discovery of insulin.

A WONDERFUL WOMAN

While we talked, Best kept looking toward the door, explaining that he expected his wife. She had gone to a luncheon and a tour of the art museum. Finally the door opened and the doctor was on his feet immediately. But the open door revealed only the maid, and Best's disappointment showed. "Oh, I thought it was Margaret. She's a wonderful woman; I want you to meet her. We were engaged to be married in 1920 when she was eighteen. She was Margaret Mahon. She has shared everything about the insulin work. She was going to be a lawyer, but she decided after we got engaged that she would go through in liberal arts. She specialized in history and botany. We have two boys. One is a historian and the other a botanist so that shows her influence on our family. We have six grandchildren. Someone at the Joslin Clinic once said that I must have been disappointed that neither of the boys became a doctor—well, they're both doctors, but not medical doctors. Perhaps some of the grandchildren will be doctors. I hope I live to see it. It would be very nice. You know, my father was a doctor, one of his brothers was a doctor, and there was the aunt who died, she was a trained nurse, so it runs in the family."

The door opened again and this time it was Mrs. Best. She is vivacious and attractive, possessing all the poise and charm one would expect in the wife of a world-famous scientist.

Mrs. Best was wearing a gold medallion on a chain around her neck. The design was unusual, and I asked about it. "It came with an honorary degree Charlie received in Venezuela. When he gave it to Charlie, the rector of the university handed Charlie the hood and the scroll and then said 'the medal is for the girlfriend.' He got a beautiful medal at the Vatican, but the Pope didn't mention anything for the girlfriend."

Speaking of all the awards that have come to him, Dr. Best said, "Any one of them would be honor enough, but I must say that the one I am going to get in February from the Queen gives me a particular pleasure. I am going to be given the Companion of Honor. It's one of the highest honors you can get in the British Empire. And because of my background, I am very happy about it. My ancestors all came from England and northern Ireland. They settled in Nova Scotia at the time Halifax was founded. Louisburg was a French fortress, so the British decided to counterbalance it with Halifax. That was in 1749."

Dr. Best turned gack to his wife and softly suggested perhaps she should lie down for awhile and rest before the evening's festivities. When she left the room, he said, "I'm afraid we're going to be spending most of this year and next year with insulin celebrations. Margaret gets caught up in these things, and I'm afraid she does too much. I have to watch out for her. Excuse me, I want to fix some pillows for her to put her feet up." While he was gone Mrs. Best reappeared to claim some pictures of her grandchildren that were left behind. "You know," she said, "Charlie gets caught up in these things and I am afraid he will do too much. I have to watch out for him."

I departed amid genial goodbyes and return invitations. In the cab to the airport I reflected on what a profound effect two women have had on the life of Charles Best. Indeed, on the lives of millions of people.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10:00 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF RECOGNITION OF LEADERS TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, if it is agreeable with the distinguished minority leader, that the leaders' time on tomorrow be limited to 5 minutes each rather than 10.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will be happy to agree to that limitation.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SPECIAL ORDERS FOR TOMORROW, AND ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the two leaders are recognized tomorrow, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MORGAN) be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes, and that he be followed by the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS) and the Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA), each for not to exceed 15 minutes, after which the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 887, S. 3243, the local public works bill, upon which there is a time agreement; that upon the disposition of that measure, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 822, S. 2090, the community services bill, on which there is a time agreement; and that after the disposition of that measure, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 815, S. 2788, the ConRail bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, it might be necessary, if a measure or some measures are cleared for action on both sides, that the leadership would attempt to sandwich something else in between one or more of these measures, depending upon the circumstances at the time.

ORDER FOR RECONSIDERATION OF S. 3342

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to request the House of Representatives to return the papers on S. 3342, and that the action of the Senate in tabling the motion to reconsider the vote by which that bill was passed be vitiated; that the bill be returned to second reading; that an amendment by the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS) be in order; that there be a 30-minute time limitation on that amendment, to be equally divided between and controlled by Senator CURTIS and Senator RANDOLPH; that no other amendment be in order; that no other motion and no further debate be in order; but that upon the disposition of that amendment one way or the other, the bill be again advanced to third reading and passed without further debate or motion; and that a motion to reconsider then be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I make this request at the urging of Mr. CURTIS, who for good reasons, was unable to be here at the time that bill passed the Senate and a motion to table a motion to reconsider was quickly made. Mr. CURTIS had wanted to offer an amendment to that measure.

This request has been cleared with Mr. RANDOLPH, the chairman of the committee, and all around.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. I would only rise to thank the majority leader for accommodating Senator CURTIS, who, of course, is chairman of our conference and is occupied with many duties that carry him away from the floor. As the majority leader pointed out, it was an inadvertence, one of those things that rarely but sometimes happen in the Senate, and I thank the majority leader for this opportunity to pick up that dropped stitch.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I was happy to do it, and I thank the minority leader for those kind remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will observe that that can only happen in this great legislative body.

PROGRAM

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, for the benefit of Senators, I will now state the program for tomorrow, to appear in the RECORD immediately preceding the order to recess for the day.

Mr. President, there will be rollcall votes tomorrow on three measures that have been laid down. The Senate will come in at 10 o'clock. Messrs. MORGAN, STEVENS, and HAYAKAWA will each be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes after the two leaders have been recognized under the order for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

After the disposition of the orders for recognition of Senators, the Senate will proceed to take up the local public works bill, on which there is a time agreement; following that, the Senate will take up the community services bill, on which there is a time agreement; and following that, the Senate will take up the ConRail bill, on which there is a time agreement.

It is hoped that the debt limit extension measure can be taken up tomorrow. There may be other measures which can be cleared for action. So all in all, I would say the prospects are that there will be several rollcall votes tomorrow, and it is possible that the Senate will stay in until a reasonably early hour in the evening.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and at 7:15 p.m. the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Tuesday, August 1, 1978, at 10 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, July 31, 1978

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT).

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT) laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
July 31, 1978.

I hereby designate the Honorable JIM WRIGHT to act as Speaker pro tempore for today.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake.—Psalms 23: 3.

Eternal Father of our spirits, in whom we live and move and have our being, come Thou anew into our hearts and make us ready for the work we have to do. In the duties of this day keep us seekers after the truth, strivers for justice, and servants of peace. Rekindle in us and in our people a reverence for Thy Commandments, a true love of freedom, and a higher conception of patriotism that we may keep our Nation good in spirit, generous in attitude, and great in service to others.

Bless the homes of our people, the institutions of learning in our land, the concerns which conduct the business of our Republic, and all who work in local, State, and national office. Be Thou the Lord of their inner life and outer conduct that into our world may come a greater spirit of freedom, justice, and good will. So may Thy kingdom come and Thy will be done in us and on Earth to the glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a call of the House is ordered.

There was no objection.

The call was taken by electronic device, and the following Members failed to respond:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 12138. An act to name a certain Federal building in Laguna Niguel, Calif., the "Chet Holifield Building."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 2463. An act to amend the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 (Public Law 95-87) to raise certain authorized funding levels contained therein, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 10787. An act to authorize appropriations for activities and program carried out by the Secretary of the Interior through the Bureau of Land Management.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2391) entitled "An act to extend the Commodity Exchange Act, and for other purposes," agrees to a conference requested by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. TALMADGE, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. CLARK, Mr. STONE, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. DOLE, Mr. BELLMON, and Mr. LUGAR to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2399. An act to amend the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 and other laws to meet obligations under the Convention on Psychotropic Substances relating to regulatory controls on the manufacture, distribution, importation, and exportation of psychotropic substances, and for other purposes;

S. 2820. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, restore, operate, and maintain new or modified features at existing Federal reclamation dams for safety of dams purposes; and

S. 3342. An act to name a lake which has been completed as part of the Papillion Creek basin project as the "Standing Bear Lake."

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3(b) of rule XXVII, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

After all motions to suspend the rules have been entertained and debated and after those motions, to be determined by "nonrecord" votes have been disposed of, the Chair will then put the question on each motion on which the further proceedings were postponed.

OCEAN SHIPPING ACT OF 1978

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 9998) to provide for the regulation of rates or charges by certain State-owned carriers in the foreign commerce of the United States, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 9998

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Ocean Shipping Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. The first section of the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended (46 U.S.C. 801), is further amended by inserting the following definition of the term "controlled carrier" immediately following the definition of the term "common carrier by water":

"The term 'controlled carrier' means a common carrier by water operating, offering, or proposing to offer service in the foreign commerce of the United States which carrier is or whose operating assets are directly or indirectly owned or controlled by the government under whose registry the vessels of the controlled carrier operate. Ownership or control by such government shall be deemed to exist if a majority portion of the interest in the carrier is owned or controlled in any manner by such government, by any agency of the government, or by any person, corporation, or entity controlled by such government. Ownership or control shall also be deemed to exist if the government has the right to appoint or disapprove the appointment of a majority of the directors or the chief operating or executive officer of the carrier".

SEC. 3. Section 18 of the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended (46 U.S.C. 817), is further amended by adding at the end thereof, the following new subsection:

"(c)(1) No controlled carrier subject to this Act shall maintain rates or charges in its tariffs filed with the Commission that are below a level which is just and reasonable, nor shall any such carrier establish or maintain unjust or unreasonable classifications, rules, or regulations in such tariffs. An unjust or unreasonable classification, rule, or regulation means one which results or is likely to result in the carriage or handling of cargo at rates or charges which are below a level which is just and reasonable. The Commission may at any time after notice and hearing, disapprove any rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations which the controlled carrier has failed to demonstrate to be just and reasonable. In any proceeding under this subsection, the burden of proof shall be on the controlled carrier to demonstrate that its rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations are just and reasonable. Rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations filed by a controlled carrier which have been rejected, suspended, or disapproved by the Commission are void, and their use is unlawful.

"(2) For the purpose of this subsection, in determining whether rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations by a controlled carrier are just and reasonable, the Commission may take into account appropriate factors, including, but not limited to, whether: (i) the rates or charges which have been filed or which would result from the pertinent classifications, rules, or regulations are below a level which is fully compensatory to the controlled carrier based upon that carrier's actual costs or upon its constructive costs, which are hereby defined as the costs of another carrier, other than a controlled carrier, operating similar vessels and equipment in the same or a similar trade; (ii) the rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations are the same as or similar to those filed or assessed by other carriers in the same trade; (iii) the rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations are required to assure movement of particular cargo in the trade; or (iv) the rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations are required to maintain acceptable continuity, level, or quality of common carrier service to or from affected ports.

"(3) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (b)(2) of this section, rates, charges, classifications, rules or regulations of controlled carriers shall not, without special permission of the Commission, become effective within less than thirty days following the date of filing with the Commission. Following the effective date of this subsection, each controlled carrier shall, upon the request of the Commission, file within twenty days of request, with respect to its existing or proposed rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations a statement of justification which sufficiently details the controlled carrier's need and purpose for such rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations, upon which the Commission may reasonably base its determination of the lawfulness thereof.

"(4) Whenever the Commission is of the opinion that the rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations filed by a controlled carrier may be unjust and unreasonable, the Commission may issue an order to the controlled carrier to show cause why such rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations should not be disapproved. Pending a determination as to their lawfulness in such a proceeding, the Commission may suspend such rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations at any time prior to their effective date. In the case of any rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations which have already become effective, the Commission may, upon the issuance of an order to show cause, suspend such rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations on not less than sixty days notice to the controlled carrier. No period of suspension hereunder may be greater than one hundred and eighty days. Whenever the Commission has suspended any rates, charges, classifications, rules or regulations under this provision, the affected carrier may file new rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations to take effect immediately during the suspension period in lieu of the suspended rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations: Provided, however, That the Commission may reject such new rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations if it is of the opinion that they are unjust and unreasonable.

"(5) Concurrently with the publication thereof, the Commission shall transmit to the President any order of suspension or final order of disapproval of rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations of a controlled carrier subject to the provisions of this subsection. Within ten days after the receipt or the effective date of such Commission order, whichever is later, the President may request the Commission in writing to stay the effect of the Commission's order if he finds that such stay is required for reasons of national defense or foreign policy which reasons shall be specified in the report. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commission shall immediately grant such request by the issuance of an order in which the President's request shall be described. During any such stay, the President shall, whenever practicable, attempt to resolve the matter in controversy by negotiation with representatives of the applicable foreign governments.

"(6) The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to: (i) any controlled carrier of a state whose vessels are entitled by a treaty of the United States to receive national or most-favored-nation treatment; (ii) any controlled carrier of a state which, on the effective date of this subsection, has subscribed to the statement of shipping policy contained in note 1 to annex A of the Code of Liberalization of Current Invisible Operations, adopted by the Council of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development; (iii) rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations of any controlled carrier in any particular trade which are covered by an agreement approved under section 15 of this Act, other than an agreement in which all of the members are controlled carriers not otherwise excluded from the provisions of this subsection; (iv) rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations governing the transportation of cargo by a controlled carrier between the country by whose government it is owned or controlled, as defined herein, and the United States, or any of its districts, territories, or possessions; or (v) a trade served exclusively by controlled carriers.".

SEC. 4. The provisions of this Act, including the amendments made by this Act, shall become effective thirty days after its date of enactment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) and the gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY) will be recognized for 20 minutes each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 9998, as amended, the Ocean Shipping Act of 1978.

The purpose of this legislation is to strengthen the provisions of the Shipping Act, 1916, and thus, the powers of the Federal Maritime Commission to regulate the rate-cutting practices of state-controlled carriers. The objective of this strengthening is to preserve legitimate competition, among all common carriers engaged in the foreign commerce of the United States, insure the survival of the American merchant marine, provide a means to monitor and check, if necessary, the future penetration of state-owned carriers into U.S. trade, and thus maintain and promote our international trade.

The United States is the largest trading Nation in the world today, but American liner companies must compete for cargoes in this trade with the liner companies of other nations. In order to penetrate the liner trades of the United States, state owned or controlled carriers, backed by the full resources of sovereign governments and motivated by noncommercial considerations, have actively and systematically pursued a practice to rate cutting to attract more cargo for their ships. This threatens to disrupt our international trade and jeopardize the economic viability of U.S. and other privately owned carriers serving this trade.

The U.S. liner trade is essentially an open trade without restrictions to entry or exit. Groups of carriers have traditionally organized as shipping conferences, establish agreed-upon rate levels for member carriers, and operate on most of the major trade routes. It should be readily apparent that the U.S. liner trades are designed to give American-flag carriers—and those of the nations with whom we trade—a fair chance to compete for cargoes in their own trades.

Since 1971 there has been an unprecedented penetration by Soviet liner fleets into the U.S. foreign trades. This penetration by the state-controlled Soviet merchant marine is separate and distinct from the grain and bilateral cargo trade resulting from the U.S.-U.S.S.R. maritime agreement of 1972. On U.S. trade routes modern Soviet intermodal vessels are now cross trading between the United States and Japan in the North Pacific and between the United States and Western Europe in the North Atlantic. From a relatively insignificant penetration of 0.3 percent in 1971, the Soviet merchant marine has increased its share of the U.S. commercial liner cargo market to 3.4 percent as of the first 9 months of 1977. This represents a tenfold increase in the Soviet's market share during this 6-year period. But even this sizable increase in market share does not measure the true extent of Soviet penetration.

A more representative view of the level of Soviet activity in the U.S. trades can be gained by focusing on those trade routes where they have made their heaviest peneration.

On trade route 7—the U.S. North Atlantic to West Germany—the Soviets controlled 12.3 percent of the market for the first 9 months of 1977. The Far East trades have also been heavily impacted by the Soviet merchant marine.

In tonnage terms the Soviets had their largest market share on trade route 29—the U.S. Pacific, to the Far East. For the full year of 1976, the Soviet carried 458,823 tons or cargo on this trade route, which was by far the largest amount of cargo carried by the Soviet merchant marine in the U.S. liner cross trades.

The problems that could develop in the future because of the presence of the Soviet's fleet can only be appreciated if this selective penetration tactic is understood.

Maritime Administration has forecast that by 1985 the Soviets will command a 6.6-percent market share. But this forecast is predicated on the entire U.S. liner trade, not the selective routes the Soviets have chosen to penetrate. The forecast of 6.6 percent market share is approximately a 100-percent increase over the 1977 penetration level of 3.4 percent. If past patterns held true, this means that on selected trade routes, such as those already mentioned, the Soviet market share will be in the range of 20 percent on major Atlantic trade routes and over 10 percent on the all-important Pacific-Far East trades.

This increased Soviet market share is coming at the expense of all national-flag carriers, including U.S. operators. From 1974 to 1976 the Soviet share as a relative proportion of the U.S.-flag share of our liner trade has increased significantly. In 1974 the Soviet cargo carried was 1,073,000 tons while U.S. vessels carried 15,350,000 tons; the Soviet share of this total cargo was therefore 6.5 percent. By 1976 the Soviet were carrying 1,434,000 tons of cargo while the U.S. carriage remained relatively stagnant at 15,380,000. The Soviet share of this total pool of cargo increased to 8.5 percent. This represents a 30.1-percent increase in the Soviet's relative share of this pool of cargo over a span of only 2 years.

The Soviets have been able to increase their market share by rate cutting which may be 10 to 50 percent lower than competing conference rates and by a concerted effort to upgrade the portion of their fleet utilized in U.S. liner trades. As new specialized container ships and roll-on/roll-off vessels come off the assembly line a large percentage of this new Soviet construction is immediately placed in the U.S. trades. The magnitude of the potential of the Soviets to further penetrate U.S. markets is demonstrated by the fact that their 5-year plan (1976–80) calls for a threefold increase in containerships and roll-on/roll-off vessels. There is every reason to believe that the Soviets will devote increasing numbers of these sophisticated vessels to the U.S. cross trades since a large proportion of the Soviet oceanborne trade is more suitable to bulk- and tanker-type vessels, not container and roll-on/roll-off vessels.

One of the most troubling aspects of Soviet entry into the cross trades is their motivation. Normal market theory would state that firms will enter a market and increase their penetration if they expect to sustain profits from their operations. The company must earn a normal rate of return or profit over the long run if it is to remain a going concern. Pricing below costs is obviously impossible if the company is going to survive. The Soviets, however, are not constrained by demands from the investment community that they earn profits. The Soviet motivation is political, military, and economic; but their economic motivations are distinct from normal market motivations. The Soviet key to performance is their compelling and persistent need for earning of hard currency. If the earning of hard currency is the goal, then the Soviet carrier can lose money in an overall operational sense, that is gross expenditures in dollars and rubles may exceed dollars received in revenue, but so long as the net dollars received is positive, the goal of earning hard currency will be achieved.

It is imperative that the Soviets earn hard currency to pay for badly needed grain and high technology imports from the West and also to service their accumulated hard currency deficit. The Soviet's need to earn hard currency stems from the fact that their accumulated hard currency debt with the West is approximately $16 billion. The annual interest payments on this debt consume about 25 percent of the Soviet's annual hard currency earnings. Clearly, the Soviets are desperate to earn dollars, marks, yen, and other convertible currencies and the U.S. merchant marine is bearing the brunt of the Soviet's inability to find other means to earn hard currency.

The conflicting goals of hard currency earnings for the Soviets and conventional profit maximization for Western carriers makes competition between the two an extremely difficult proposition; the Soviet economic system with its nonmarket pricing techniques, industrial and wage subsidies, makes competition untenable. Market oriented carriers simply are not able to compete on equal grounds with Soviet carriers which are not required to cover their full costs either in the long run or short run.

It is appropriate to add that the damage caused by the controlled carriers to our liner trades strikes at the heart of the promotional programs embodied in the Merchant Marine Act, 1936. In the absence of the enactment of H.R. 9998 or similar legislation, it may become questionable for the Government and it would be foolish for private industry to invest substantial sums in enterprises that at best can produce marginal returns. Moreover, despite the availability of subsidy, the adverse effect of predatory rate practices also jeopardizes the U.S.-flag liner fleet and casts serious doubt upon the capability of the fleet to meet its national security purpose, which, I need not remind you, is one of the primary goals of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as reconfirmed by Congress in the Merchant Marine Act of 1970. We cannot afford to allow the predatory practices of the controlled carriers to thwart this vital purpose of the U.S.-flag fleet.

To meet this very real threat to the waterborne foreign commerce of the United States, the Shipping Act, 1916, must be amended to provide more effective enforcement procedure against predatory rate practices.

H.R. 9998, as amended, would amend the Shipping Act, 1916, to define ocean carriers which are owned or controlled by foreign governments as "controlled carriers." In conjunction with this new definition, which describes the criteria for determining government control or ownership, H.R. 9998 would establish new requirements governing the rates, fares, charges, or classifications in the tariffs of such controlled carriers. The bill would prohibit the use of rates which are below a level that is just and reasonable. To enforce this prohibition, H.R. 9998 would give the Federal Maritime Commission the authority to disapprove the rates after notice and hearing.

Whenever the FMC believes that a controlled carrier's rates are not just and reasonable according to the criteria in H.R. 9998, the Commission could issue an order to show cause why the rates should not be disapproved. Pending a determination of the issue, the bill would permit the FMC to suspend such rates, for a period not exceeding 180 days, whether they were then in effect or merely proposed. During the suspension period, the controlled carrier could file new rates which would take effect immediately unless the FMC was of the opinion that they were unjust and unreasonable. H.R. 9998 assigns to the controlled carrier the burden of proof for justifying the rates on file. The use of any disapproved, rejected, or suspended rates would be illegal. This bill empowers the President to intervene in order to prevent a suspension or final order of disapproval of the controlled carrier's rates if he finds such action is necessary for reasons of national defense or foreign policy reasons. The bill would also require every controlled carrier to submit, within 20 days after an FMC request, a detailed statement in support of its proposed or existing rates. In addition, no rates could become effective in less than 30 days after FMC filing without special FMC permission.

Significantly, the provisions of H.R. 9998 would not apply to all controlled carriers or to all the rates filed by those controlled carriers which are subject to the bill. For example, controlled carriers of a state whose vessels receive national or most-favored-nation treatment by treaty and those carriers which are members of conferences or other section 15 agreements in the applicable trade are excluded from the bill's provision. In addition, the rates of a controlled carrier which govern the transportation of cargo between the United States and the nation under whose flag the controlled carrier operates, that is bilateral trade, and those in a trade served exclusively by a controlled carrier are exempted from the provisions of H.R. 9998, as amended.

After several years of factfinding and deliberation, the committee has concluded that the rate-cutting activities of controlled carriers in the U.S. liner trades demand a swift and just resolution. If the Soviet liner fleet is allowed to penetrate our trade routes to the point where it weakens or destroys our merchant marine, it would seriously erode our capability to independently supply our own forces, when and where required.

In addition to the convincing testimony adduced at the hearings on H.R. 9998, the committee conducted a briefing on October 27, 1977, partly classified, on Soviet maritime activities and their effective on the U.S. liner trades. The subjects covered included the structure of the Soviet merchant marine, employment, U.S.-U.S.S.R. maritime agreements, liner trade penetration, and Soviet maritime strategy and policy. This briefing provided background information which reinforced our conclusions reached on H.R. 9998.

The committee believes it has wisely and equitably addressed the need for strengthening the powers of the FMC to deal with the unique problem of the controlled carriers in our liner trades. H.R. 9998, as amended, will provide a flexible, credible and long-term deterrent to predatory rate practices and would thereby protect the American shipping public and contribute to shipping in the foreign commerce of the United States. At the same time it would conform to our international obligations and to our commitment to fair competition in shipping.

Many other Western nations have expressed their concern with this worldwide problem of the trade disruption by the fast growing Soviet merchant marine, and several different approaches to the problem are being considered by those nations. I believe we have moved forward with the approach which is best for the United States and its various interests. Most importantly, we have moved forward before it is too late to correct the problem.

Mr. Speaker, I think this legislation is long overdue, and I would certainly urge all my colleagues to join us in its passage.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. CHARLES WILSON).

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 9998, a bill "to provide for the regulation of rates or charges by certain state-owned carriers in the foreign commerce of the United States, and for other purposes."

The American foreign trades are the most lucrative in the world. American flag liner vessels compete for cargoes in these trades with the ships of many other nations. The competition for these cargoes, however, is being distorted by a startling phenomenon.

By their rate-cutting activities, the carriers of the Soviet Union have captured large amounts of cargo that would be carried by U.S.-flag vessels and vessels of our trading partners and have had a severely disruptive effect of our liner trades. In the transpacific trades, where, in tonnage terms, Soviet penetration has been greatest, the Federal Maritime Commission has found widespread illegal rebating, the conference system has been weakened by many carriers dropping out, and one of our own U.S.-flag carriers, Pacific Far East Lines has been forced into bankruptcy.

In our Atlantic coast/Northern Europe trade, the Soviets have captured over 13 percent of the cargo since 1971 by charging rates as much as 60 percent below those of other carriers. During this period of Soviet growth, two other independent, nonconference carriers attempted to match the Soviets' rate-cutting practices and terminated their operations in bankruptcy. A third carrier was forced to withdraw from the trade because of Soviet competition.

In the inbound trade from the Philippines, one of the major commodities is rattan furniture. As a result of charging rates that average about 28 percent below the conference rates on this important cargo, the Soviet Far Eastern Steamship Co. is now on the way to gaining a near monopoly of its movement to the United States.

The Soviets have recently entered our trade with Australia. By constructing special "freight-all-kinds" rates, they are carrying some high value cargo at rates approaching 50 percent of those of the conference in that trade.

The record of hearings on this bill is replete with examples such as these.

The Soviets can charge whatever they need to in order to attract the cargo and the hard currency that pays for it. They are simply not constrained by profit motives, a situation that the Shipping Act, 1916, is not designed to encompass.

This legislation is sorely needed in order to protect our trade and to preserve the fleets of our own Nation and those of our trading partners.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this is one of those rare moments when the gentleman from New York and I are in agreement, albeit from slightly different viewpoints.

I support H.R. 9998, the controlled carrier bill, because it represents perhaps the only reasonable way to effectively monitor the growing intrusion of Eastern bloc carriers into United States ocean trades at the present time. This intrusion would be welcome were it not for the degree of government support which is involved in what has been ordinarily a competitive, free enterprise system of transportation.

While a free enterprise economy is generally the strongest overall, it is vulnerable to a controlled economy's ability to target on specific economic sectors. The Soviets obviously have found U.S. trade routes a suitable area for targeting because they can thereby establish a commercial presence around the world, provide badly needed hard currency to pay for Western imports, provide intelligence gathering capability and enhance their auxiliary capacity for the growing Soviet Navy. Our own governmental policies in support of our merchant marine could obviously be made ineffective by permitting unlimited Soviet support of their merchant marine.

Thus, it is appropriate that our Government have the authority to monitor, and check if necessary, an undue presence of government-supported carriers in our trades when that governmental support prevents fair competition. Commercial operators, confronted with competition backed by the full resources of sovereign governments which are motivated by noncommercial considerations, cannot do the job alone. The bill aims to assist our ocean carriers by authorizing the Federal Maritime Commission to suspend or reject controlled carriers' rates that are below a level the Commission finds "just and reasonable."

It may well be argued that the FMC has not earned the right to this increase in its power, and indeed, the FMC has a rather miserable performance record in many of its areas of responsibility—in policing illegal rebating and resolving the minibridge issue, for example.

The FMC's procedural delays are atrocious, and when our forthcoming oversight hearings get underway next month, I think it highly possible that we may want to abolish the agency entirely, transferring its domestic regulatory authority to the ICC and its foreign affairs authority to a Cabinet-level department.

There are other concerns. The bill may permit some restriction on legitimate commercial competition. For example, the committee did not adopt an administration-suppported amendment which would have permitted a controlled carrier's rate unless it was more than 15 percent below conference rates or lower than that of any other independent. Thus, the bill could prevent controlled carriers from reducing their rates to meet those of their competition. If the bill is administered to permit this, it could effectively prevent legitimate operators from entering into U.S. trades. Congress will have to be vigilant to insure that this does not happen, since the FMC has not demonstrated any ability in the past to move with speed unless U.S. shipping companies were endangered, and even then the FMC's record is very weak.

Also the bill adds yet another layer of Government regulation onto U.S. foreign trade. This is not only expensive to administer, but adds to the costs of the importers and exporters who utilize the services of controlled carriers. As a policy matter, this is clearly undesirable.

For the time being, however, the bill before us gives us at least a chance of improving a difficult situation. The President has recently formed an interagency task force on maritime policy and promised comprehensive recommendations for changes in our maritime policy before Congress reconvenes in 1979. I am hopeful that as a part of this comprehensive package, the President will honor his campaign promise to reduce bureaucracy and governmental regulation by recommending a more direct, less complicated means of dealing with controlled carriers. This bill as an interim measure should do no harm, but neither should it lull us into abandoning our forceful inquiry and search for an entirely new policy which will permit an honest, competent, and efficient service to our American shippers—something we have not had for many years. The new policy may very well require abolition of the agency we strengthen today, the Federal Maritime Commission, but that welcome action can wait until next year and the next Congress. The problem this bill addresses cannot.

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 9998, the Ocean Shipping Act of 1978.

I cosponsored this bill to provide our merchant marine with an opportunity to legitimately compete for a fair share of available cargoes with the merchant marine of the Soviet Union, or other countries' owned or controlled ships.

The committee received expert testimony that showed the Soviet merchant marine are filling their ships by cutting the commercially negotiated rates. Their Government supports their merchant marine, thus the term "state-owned or controlled carrier." The Soviet's motivation is: First, economic—they need to earn hard currency, that is, foreign income in dollars or other convertible currency to finance the importation of high technology products and grain, and second, political—a country carrying its own cargo and a share of world shipping, while calling at 40 U.S. ports and 64 foreign ports is a show of strength.

Since the Soviet Union does not have to adhere to making a profit they are now offering service in at least 16 U.S. trade routes. Their penetration into our trades has been remarkable. The committee's report on this bill said:

> Since the signing of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Maritime Agreement in 1972, bilateral liner cargo carried by the Soviet fleet has averaged about 10 to 15 percent of their total liner carriage with the remaining 85 to 90 percent being cross-trade cargo. In 1971, the Soviets carried 160,000 long tons of the U.S. trade; in 1976, they carried 1,434,000 long tons. The increase was 896 percent in 5 years or an average annual growth of 179 percent.

Specifically, on trade route 29, the route between the Pacific Coast, Hawaii to the Far East the Soviet Union has 6.4 percent of the market. They are concentrating their rate cutting on the high valued, large volume, commodities in each trade.

This "skimming" worries U.S.-flag liner operators, because the Soviet merchant marine in their rate-cutting practices is grabbing the best business.

Recently, the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries learned that a portion of 398 articulated diesel buses, which were financed by a grant from the Urban Mass Transportation Administration—Department of Transportation—were shipped on Soviet vessels. The Soviet freight rate for the buses was lower than the U.S.-flag rate. Many of us are bothered by the fact that our Federal Government was subsidizing the Soviet merchant fleet, while apparently ignoring our Cargo Preference Act of 1954—Public Law 664—which requires that at least 50 percent of Government generated cargoes be shipped on U.S.-flag vessel.

This legislation is designed to help the survival of our American merchant marine by strengthening the provisions of the Shipping Act, 1916, and thus, the powers of the Federal Maritime Commission to regulate the rate-cutting practices of state-controlled ships. Mr. Speaker, I urge the House adopt H.R. 9998.●

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 9998, the Ocean Shipping Act of 1978.

The Soviets have a merchant fleet in excess of their own national trade requirements which they utilize for full time cross trading. Since the Soviets are hard pressed for hard currency, their maritime activity in the cross trades in the United States is not motivated by normal commercial practices but by the compelling imperative to maximize hard currency earnings. The Soviets are not bound to uphold any criteria of profitability that is similar to that required in market-economy companies.

The Soviet operators have entered the U.S. trades through rate cutting which may be 10 to 50 percent lower than the competing conference rates. From only 0.3 percent in tonnage of the U.S. liner trade in 1971, the Soviets increased their penetration to 3.4 percent in 1977. With greater Soviet vessel capacity predicted increased Soviet penetration of the U.S. liner trades could cause serious instability in our international trades.

Since the Soviet fleet is not motivated by commercial objectives but by military, political, and state economic considerations, the privately owned fleets of the Western World cannot long survive such nonmarket competition which is not profit based.

The Soviet merchant fleet has experienced substantial growth during the last two decades. Since 1960, the Soviets have increased their merchant fleet markedly both in numbers of vessels and in carrying capacity. In 1960, the Soviet merchant fleet had 650 vessels of 3.9 million dwt. It is reported that the Soviet merchant marine at the end of December 1977 consisted of 1,708 vessels of 17.5 million dwt. The Soviet merchant fleet has increased an average of 0.8 million dwt per year since 1960. In 1977, the fleet increased by 1 million dwt, a 6-percent increase over 1976.

As of December 31, 1977, the fleet consisted of 1,356 dry cargo vessels of 10,564 thousand dwt, representing 60 percent of the fleet; four combination oil/dry bulk carriers or 364 thousand dwt, 2 percent of the fleet; and 348 tankers of 65,991 thousand dwt, 38 percent of the fleet.

In 1978, the Soviet merchant fleet is expected to acquire 63 vessels of 1.6 million dwt. This includes 43 dry cargo vessels of 511,981 dwt; 15 tankers of 479,325 dwt; and five OBO's of 565,876 dwt. Additions to the dry cargo fleet will include 34 liner types of 391,234 dwt including 8 full containerships of 76,340 dwt; 15 Ro/Ro's of 208,140 dwt, 1 barge carrier of 36,600 dwt and 10 general cargo vessels of 70,154 dwt.

The dry cargo fleet in 1977 included 789 liner type vessels of 6,613 thousand dwt, 32 refrigerator vessels of 158 thousand dwt, 408 timber carriers of 2,093 thousand dwt, and 127 bulk carriers of 1,699 thousand dwt.

The liner fleet of the Soviet merchant marine has become increasingly specialized. At the end of 1977, the specialized fleet, that is, partial containerships, full containership, and Ro/Ro's consisted of 184 vessels of 1.6 million dwt, including 145 partial containerships of 1.3 million dwt, 15 full containerships of 140,232 dwt; and 24 Ro/Ro's of 184,260 dwt with all of these vessels being built since 1970. In 1977, the specialized fleet increased approximately 11 percent over its 1976 size, with the delivery of 11 partial containerships of 124,455 dwt, 1 full containership of 17,499 dwt and 5 Ro/Ro's of 25,518 dwt. Thus far in 1978, the Soviet fleet has taken delivery of four partial containerships totaling 34,999 dwt; one full containership totaling 17,499 dwt; and two Ro/Ro's totaling 22,300 dwt.

The Soviets have tended to employ vessels of the larger classes of their specialized fleet in the U.S. trades. In 1977, partial containerships of the Geroi Panfilovtsy class averaging 13,500 dwt with 342 TEU's; the Varnemyunde class, averaging 12,025 dwt with 368 TEU's; and the Nikolay Novikov class, averaging 14,000 dwt with 308 TEU's; were in regular service in the U.S. liner trades.

In 1977, full containerships were represented by all four vessels of the Khudozhnik Saryan class, each of 17,499 dwt and 729 TEU's. The first of these vessels was built in 1975, two in 1976, and one in 1977. A fifth Khudozhnik Saryan class vessel has been added to the fleet this year and is operating regularly in the U.S. liner trades.

In 1977, Ro/Ro service in the U.S. trades was provided by the two vessels comprising the Magnitogorsk class averaging 21,846 dwt of 1,368 TEU's and two vessels of the Skulptor Konenkov class, each 18,460 dwt with 772 TEU's. A new Skulptor Konenkov class vessel, the Skulptor Golubkina of 17,500 dwt, has been added to the fleet this year and is operating in the U.S. Atlantic/Gulf liner trades.

H.R. 9998, as amended, represents a viable, balanced approach to the very real threat posed by the actions of certain controlled carriers operating in our waterborne foreign commerce. However, I should stress, Mr. Speaker, that we do not suggest that this legislation should be enacted merely to protect U.S. liner interests. Rather, to the extent that the new procedures enable the FMC to provide a more stable business environment in the U.S. trades generally, such stability will benefit all carriers in those trades, regardless of flag, as well as their patrons. As participants in the more stable environment. U.S. liner interests will also benefit.●

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 9998, the Ocean Shipping Act of 1978, a bill which I believe is vitally needed to insure the survival of the U.S. liner fleet. I also would commend the chairman and the members of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee for preparing and bringing before the Congress today a bill that should serve as a credible, flexible, and effective deterrent to the rate-cutting activities of State-controlled shipping companies.

Penetration of U.S. trade routes by Soviet liner vessels has increased significantly since afforded the right under the U.S.-U.S.S.R. maritime agreements to participate in our oceanborne trades. This participation has been heaviest in our trades which do not even involve the Soviet Union, such as the United States to Japan and United States to West Germany trades where the Soviets have no valid national interest.

The Soviet merchant fleet has increased its overall penetration level tenfold since 1971 and their vessels currently carry 3.4 percent of all oceanborne cargo carried in the U.S. trades. Projections by the U.S. Maritime Administration forecast a 6.6-percent penetration level by 1985.

These numbers do not tell the full story of the impact of Soviet penetration, however. The Soviets have been selective as to which trades they wish to disrupt. On some of our most vital trade routes the Soviets have shown an intense desire to gain a sizable market share.

Based on MarAd's forecast of a doubling of the Soviet's market share by 1985, we can conclude that the Soviet threat to particular U.S. trades will become much more aggragated in the future. The Soviets will have over 20 percent of our North Atlantic to West Germany, and Gulf to Far East trades, and more than 10 percent of our huge Pacific coast to Far East trade. Clearly, this drain on the cargo available to U.S. carriers and those of our trading partners will cause increasing financial difficulties for these vessel operators.

Furthermore, as an ever larger share of our foreign trade is carried on Soviet ships, we run the risk of becoming overly dependent on the Soviet Union for the transportation of our necessities. Action must be taken now to prevent further inroads into our liner-shipping industry by the rate-cutting tactics of these and other State-controlled carriers. I, therefore, fully support the passage of H.R. 9998.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.●

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OBÉY). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 9998, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

DUTIES SUSPENSION ON STRONTIUM NITRATE

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5044) to suspend until January 3, 1980, a portion of the duties on strontium nitrate, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5044

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subpart B of part 1 of the Appendix to the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) is amended by inserting immediately after item 907.12 the following new item:

| | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| " 907.15 | Strontium nitrate (provided for in item 421.74, part 2C, schedule 4). | Free... | No change. | On or before 1/3/80.". |

SEC. 2. The amendment made by the first section of this Act shall apply with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) will be recognized for 20 minutes each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK).

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5044, which provides for the temporary suspension of duties on imports of strontium nitrate, was introduced by our colleagues, Messrs. BAUMAN, FINDLEY, and HILLIS.

Strontium nitrate is used in the manufacture of tracer bullets, flares and other signal-type products since it produces a red color during combustion. The principal consumers are the military and the railway and trucking industries. Currently, there is only one domestic producer of strontium nitrate which is unable to meet domestic demand. U.S. manufacturers of signal products, unable to obtain domestic supplies of strontium nitrate, are therefore forced to increase their costs of production through payment of the duty on the imported strontium nitrate.

Section 1 of H.R. 5044, as amended, provides that the column 1 (MFN) rate of duty of 6 percent ad valorem would be suspended until January 3, 1980. The column 2 rate of duty, which applies to imports from most Communist countries, would remain unchanged.

Section 2 of H.R. 5044, as amended, would provide that the provisions of section 1 would take effect on the date of enactment.

Public hearings were held by the Subcommittee on Trade on April 26–28, 1977, on this and other miscellaneous tariff measures. During these hearings favorable testimony was received on H.R. 5044. Unfavorable reports were received from the Departments of Commerce, Treasury, State and Labor as well as from the Office of the Special Representative for Trade Negotiations which oppose enactment on the grounds that duty reductions generally should take place in the context of the MTN and that the single domestic producer currently meets a substantial portion of domestic demand. Your committee is not convinced that there is much negotiating value in a duty reduction amounting to a revenue loss of $17,000. Also, as pointed out earlier, the inability of the single domestic producer to meet all domestic demand merely serves to increase the production costs of those manufacturers unable to obtain domestic supplies.

Mr. Speaker, as introduced, H.R. 5044 provided for the temporary suspension of duties on imports of strontium nitrate under both column 1 and column 2. Your committee deemed it desirable to eliminate the provision providing for the temporary suspension of duty on imports of strontium nitrate entering under the column 2 rate of duty applicable to imports from most Communist countries. The amendment conforms the bill to the decision of the committee.

Your committee believes H.R. 5044, as amended, to be meritorious and unanimously urges its approval.

Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I join my colleague in supporting H.R. 5044, as amended. As the gentleman from Ohio has described already, the bill would suspend the column 1 rate of duty on imports of strontium nitrate through January 3, 1980.

Because there was some controversy associated with this bill, the Trade Subcommittee and the full Ways and Means Committee considered its merits very carefully.

Only one domestic firm, located on the west coast, currently produces strontium nitrate for use in the manufacture of tracer bullets, flares, and other signal type products. Although complete production statistics are not available because of confidentiality requirements associated with its military use, it is apparent that this single domestic producer cannot meet entirely the demand for the chemical in this country. The east coast has fulfilled its needs in the past principally by importing strontium nitrate from a firm in Canada. That firm has now closed, partly because they could not continue to absorb the cost of the tariff and still remain competitive.

Having to rely on a single producer of strontium nitrate, whether domestic or foreign, puts U.S. manufacturers of products derived from the chemical, as well as consumers, at a disadvantage. One producer shielded by a tariff is not conducive to either competitive pricing or efficient production.

In addition, there are few natural deposits of strontium nitrate in the United States. We must rely on imports, or face a shortage that could drive up prices even higher. Suspending the duty in this case may encourage new production in countries where ample natural deposits exist.

The temporary nature of the duty suspension will give Congress the opportunity to reevaluate the domestic situation in a little over 2 years to see if additional U.S. firms take up production of strontium nitrate and to see if demand is being adequately met at reasonable prices.

The administration has objected to the bill in part because duty reductions should be negotiated in the context of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations (MTN) now in progress in Geneva. Be this as it may, I agree with my colleague that the projected revenue impact is so slight as to have little negotiating value.

In conclusion, I would like to point out that the suspension applies only to column 1 rates. The committee rightly concluded that column 2 rates should remain the same unless a careful evaluation is made of all the political and economic ramifications associated with extending trade concessions to Communist countries.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that all the arguments against the bill have been adequately met, and that the bill is a good one in its present form. I urge my colleagues to pass H.R. 5044, as amended, at this time.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. VANIK. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I just want to thank the gentleman's committee for its kind consideration including both the efforts of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER).

Mr. Speaker, I rise as the sponsor of this bill to provide for my colleagues a brief explanation of its intent and purpose and why I believe it should be passed without delay.

For those unfamiliar with the chemical, strontium nitrate is the prime ingredient in the flares that are used by motorists, boaters, and military personnel as well as the luminating component in tracer bullets used by the military during night combat. It is not the kind of product that is in constant use, as it is quite common for a motorist or boater to purchase one flare for emergency purposes and to have the flare sit for long periods of time. However, when the occasion calls for the use of the flare, the need is very great indeed. It is frequently a matter of life and death and the flare can make a great difference in the outcome.

Up until the past few years there have been several domestic suppliers of strontium nitrate to the manufacturers of pyrotechnic products, but in 1975 Du Pont, which had been a major supplier of strontium nitrate to domestic manufacturers, elected to terminate its activities in this area. Accordingly, only one U.S. source is now available to supply this market. This corporation has one plant, and it can only produce a limited amount of the supply of this chemical which is needed domestically. The only other alternative for the pyrotechnic industry has been the foreign importation of strontium nitrate from Canada. While the U.S. pyrotechnic industry has done this; that is, importing the chemical from Canadian Kaiser Aluminum which runs the only nitrate plant in Canada, Kaiser has most recently announced that the present high duties on strontium nitrate may force the closure of its one plant in Nova Scotia.

This closure, which would come about as a direct result of the high tariff rates imposed by this country to protect domestic industry, would create a monopoly for the production of strontium nitrate for a company that is only able to supply a portion of the demand. Such a situation would be tragic for the several U.S. manufacturing companies in Maryland, Indiana, Illinois, and elsewhere that depend upon strontium nitrate to produce the flares and safety devices used by the consuming public and the military. Many hundreds of jobs will be affected by this decision because the pyrotechnics industry employs thousands of people and that industry is completely dependent upon a steady supply of strontium nitrate to continue operations.

The bill will act to prevent the creation of a monopoly industry in the supply of strontium nitrate in this country, will help to insure the continued operations of the pyrotechnics industry that relies upon strontium nitrate, and will insure that the American consumer will pay a reasonable price for the flares that save lives in emergencies and prevent accidents in hazardous conditions. It will save money, save jobs, and save lives, and I commend it to my colleagues for passage.

Mr. STEIGER Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 5044, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to suspend the duty on strontium nitrate until the close of January 3, 1980.".

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OCEAN SHIPPING ACT OF 1978

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The unfinished business is the question of suspending the rules and passing the bill H.R. 9998, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 9998, as amended, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 329, nays 6, not voting 97, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 9998, just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION AND NATIONAL SECURITY OF COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS TO SIT DURING THE 5-MINUTE RULE ON JULY 31, AUGUST 1 AND 2, 1978

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Legislation and National Security of the Committee on Government Operations be permitted to sit during the 5-minute rule on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, July 31, August 1, 2, and 3, 1978.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is it my understanding that there will be absolutely no markup of any legislation?

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman will yield, there would not be any markup on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. There is a slight possibility that on Thursday, if we have heard all of the witnesses, we might consider that.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I would be constrained to object if the gentleman's committee were going to mark up on Thursday. Could the gentleman just get permission for the 3 days and then come back?

Mr. BROOKS. We will just get it for the 3 days and then come back on Thursday.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Why does the gentleman not do that? Will the gentleman amend that request?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I will amend that request to include only Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

REQUEST FOR PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 11208

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill H.R. 11208, relating to civil service reform.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman explain to us why we need unanimous consent on this bad bill that was so distorted in the committee?

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the staff has been working night and day to get this ready. They might have it ready by adjournment this evening, but they probably will not. This is the usual request to have until midnight tonight.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman make it midnight tomorrow night?

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, if we do, we miss our deadline with the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Why not do it tomorrow night?

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I am not able to accommodate the gentleman on that. Under the rules of the Committee on Rules, we are not eligible to schedule on Wednesday unless it is filed tonight. That is the problem.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, then I am constrained to object, and I do object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC STABILIZATION OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS, TO SIT PAST 10 O'CLOCK A.M. ON TUESDAY AND WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 1 AND 2, 1978

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, be permitted to sit beyond 10 a.m. on Tuesday and Wednesday, August 1 and 2, 1978, to conduct hearings on National Development Bank legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is this?

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, this is for hearings only, I will say to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman can absolutely assure us there will be no markup of any legislation?

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. I can assure that to the gentleman absolutely.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, it is just 2 days of hearings?

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Just 2 days.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. It is Tuesday and Wednesday?

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 12514, FOREIGN AID AUTHORIZATIONS

Mr. DODD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 1286 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 1286

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move, section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) to the contrary notwithstanding, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12514) to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act to authorize international security assistance programs for fiscal year 1979, and for other purposes, and all points of order against section 16 of said bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5, rule XXI are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed three hours, one hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on International Relations, and two hours to be equally divided and controlled by Members designated by the chairman of the Committee on International Relations, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit. After the passage of H.R. 12514, it shall be in order in the House, section 402 (a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) to the contrary notwithstanding, to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3075 and to strike out all after the enacting clause of the said Senate bill and insert in lieu thereof the provisions contained in H.R. 12514 as passed by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PIKE). The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DODD) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. DODD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) for the purpose of debate, pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 1286 provides for the consideration of H.R. 12514, the International Security Assistance Act of 1978. This resolution provides for an open rule with 3 hours of general debate, 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on International Relations, and 2 hours to be equally divided and controlled by members designated by the chairman of the Committee on International Relations.

In addition, the resolution contains a waiver of section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act since section 16 of the bill makes a supplemental authorization for fiscal year 1978. The chairman of the Committee on the Budget has stated that he has no objection to this waiver.

The resolution also waives all points of order against section 16 of the bill for failure to comply with provisions of clause 5 of rule XXI. This section changes the status of funds for Turkey and in so doing is subject to clause 5 of rule XXI which prohibits an authorizing committee from making appropriations.

Finally, the resolution provides that after the passage of H.R. 12514, it shall be in order in the House, section 402 of the Congressional Budget Act notwithstanding, to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3075 and to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the provision contained in H.R. 12514 as passed by the House.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 12514, the International Security Assistance Act of 1978, amends the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act and authorizes the appropriation of $999.3 million for fiscal year 1979 for International Security Assistance programs and a $5 million supplemental appropriation for fiscal year 1978 for foreign sales financing for Lebanon.

This authorization of $999.3 million will fund security assistance programs amounting to $2.458 billion.

The $999.3 million authorization is broken down as follows:

First, $674.3 million, or 67 percent of the total, for foreign military sales credits to 32 nations. This amount will finance a program of $2.085 billion;

Second, $163.5 million for military assistance to five nations;

Third, $50 million for economic support for Turkey;

Fourth, $40 million for international narcotics control;

Fifth, $32.1 million for international military education and training;

Sixth, $29.4 million for international peacekeeping activities; and Seventh, $10 million for the President's foreign assistance contingency fund.

As my colleagues well know, this bill contains a number of controversial provisions, including, of course, the lifting of the arms embargo to Turkey, and the transfer of up to $800 million worth of U.S.-owned defense articles to Korea without reimbursement.

Enough will be said concerning these two major issues and other that I will not now take up my colleagues' time with a discussion on them. However, I would like to take this opportunity to highlight the basic purpose of this bill before it gets lost amidst what promises to be a long and thorough debate on some of this bill's more controversial provisions.

The primary purpose of this bill is to provide credits to allow nations to buy weapons or to provide countries direct military assistance and to educate and train foreign military personnel in the use of the weapons they buy.

Arming other nations is one of the heaviest responsibilities the United States shoulders—a responsibility which I feel we have grown to take too lightly. Year after year, the United States provides armaments worth billions of dollars to countries around the world. The Arms Control and Disarmament Agency reports that we exported 5 billion, 206 million dollars in arms in fiscal year 1977. In that same fiscal year, we concluded $9.3 billion in arms sales agreements. And in spite of the fact that a number of bilateral and multilateral negotiations are now taking place which seek to control the worldwide arms race, global expenditures on military forces are now estimated to exceed $400 billion annually. And that tremendous yearly figure is expected to grow even larger.

In the interests of our own security, we, of course, have a responsibility and a duty to insure that our allies and friends around the world are able to meet their legitimate security needs. Yet it seems to me that we often find ourselves unable to say no to a request for military assistance from friendly nations. I wonder at times whether our arms transfer policy is really in response to our own security concerns, or whether it has become a way of ingratiating ourselves with other countries and of buying their friendship. Unfortunately, a situation has evolved where the level of our friendship with any one country seems to depend on the degree of sophistication of the weapons we provide them with.

We should not only ask whether a nation has legitimate security concerns before providing arms, we must also consider what impact these weapons will have on that nation and on others. Will transferring arms to a particular nation stimulate a regional arms race, promote a repressive regime, contribute to regional instability, or increase the ability and willingness of that country to resort to the use of force before exploring other alternatives? These are questions which we in Congress must also address before approving specific arms sales or before approving credits to nations seeking to buy arms.

Some people argue that we must do all that we can to help our friends in any way, even to the point of providing them with weapons too sophisticated for them to maintain without direct American assistance or with weapons of a technological level which exceed their real security needs. And, of course, we may find that our friends of the past, like South Vietnam or Ethiopia, may not remain our friends for long.

Proponents of arms sales also maintain that building weapons is good for our economy and for providing employment. But the manufacturing of weapons, whether for our own defense or for export, should never be used simply in a public works role. Our defense production should facilitate the defense of the United States or the defense of our allies and other nations with which we share common security concerns, and for that purpose only. In fact, the arms for employment argument is a rather specious one considering that most defense industries are capital, not labor-intensive, and because the production of defense articles generates little civilian employment once the product is finished.

A third argument one hears with increasing frequency is that if we do not sell a nation the arms that it requests, it will simply get them elsewhere. That, I believe, is the worst of all arguments. If other arms suppliers sell weapons to nations whom we feel are undeserving, then let them. The United States is a nation that shoulders a great moral responsibility in the world. We undermine that responsibiliy to argue that if another nation is willing to do something we do not think is right, then perhaps we should consider doing it as well. The standards we maintain for deciding whether to sell arms abroad should remain intact regardless of what others may do.

I know that my colleagues are anxious to proceed with the consideration of House Resolution 1286 and then with the full consideration of H.R. 12514, the International Security Assistance Act of 1978.

I ask my colleagues to listen carefully to the arguments which will be presented in favor of providing foreign military sales credit, direct military assistance, and military education and training to particular nations. And I ask that these requests be carefuly assessed only in light of the security needs of the United States and the legitimate security requirements of each nation in question.

Mr. Speaker, I request that we adopt House Resolution 1286 so that we may proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 1286 is a 3-hour open rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 12514, the International Security Assistance Act of 1978. One hour of the general debate time will be divided between the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on International Relations, and the other 2 hours will be equally divided and controlled by Members designated by the chairman of the International Relations Committee. The purpose of this latter provision is to insure that equal time will be given to proponents and opponents of lifting the Turkish arms embargo. As a member of the minority party let me state unequivocally that it is not our intention that this procedure should in any way be considered a precedent for future rule requests since this does run contrary to the traditional right of equal debate time afforded the minority party. The minority did not object to this particular exception in the Rules Committee with the understanding that this was a rare exception and that the chairman of the International Relations Committee and his designees would give proponents and opponents of lifting the embargo on this side of the aisle sufficient time to make their cases. But, in the future I think we should adhere to the time-honored tradition of equal time along party lines. It has been my observation that managers on both sides have almost always made a good faith effort to accommodate all those requiring time on their respective sides of the aisle, without regard to their positions on specific issues.

The other special features of this rule include waivers of section 402(a) of the Budget Act and clause 5, rule XXI, against section 16 of the bill. The need for the Budget Act waiver is the provision in section 15 of the bill for a fiscal year 1978 emergency supplemental authorization to carry out the foreign military sales credit and guaranty programs—primarily to assist Lebanon in reconstituting its armed forces. Since section 402(a) of the Budget Act prohibits the consideration of any bill reported after May 15 preceding the fiscal year in which it is to take effect, and since this bill was reported after May 15 of 1977, a budget waiver is necessary. The Rules Committee did receive a letter from the chairman of the House Budget Committee, Mr. GIAIMO, dated July 26, in which it is stated in part:

* * * on the basis of the documentation presented by the Committee on International Relations and our own inquiry, we have concluded that this supplemental authorization satisfies the emergency standards embodied in section 402(a) of the Budget Act. Accordingly, the Budget Committee has no objection to granting a waiver of section 402(a) to permit consideration of this bill.

The rule also waives clause 5, rule XXI, prohibiting appropriations on an authorization bill, against section 16 of the bill which would lift the present prohibitions on arms assistance to Turkey, effective upon enactment of this bill.

Finally, the rule makes it possible, after passage of this bill, to take the Senate counterpart bill, S. 3075, from the Speaker's table, strike all after the enacting clause, and insert the language of the House-passed bill, for the purpose of going to conference with the other body.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 12514, the bill which this rule makes in order for consideration, authorizes some $999.3 million for U.S. security assistance programs in fiscal year 1979. As I already mentioned, the bill would lift the current partial arms embargo on Turkey and authorize some $50 million in security supporting assistance and $175 million in foreign military sales for that country. In addition, the bill increases the initial request for security assistance for Greece by $53 million. Greece is authorized to receive $35 million in grant military assistance and $140 million in foreign military sales.

The bill authorizes $1 billion in military sales credits to Israel and authorizes the President to transfer up to $800 million of U.S. defense articles and services to the Republic of Korea in connection with the withdrawal of the 2d U.S. Infantry and support forces from Korea.

Mr. Speaker, the focus of attention during general debate and the amendment process will be on section 16 of the bill which repeals section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, which prohibits delivery of previously ordered material to Turkey under the military assistance program and military sales and financing for Turkey in excess of $175 million in fiscal year 1978 as well as continuation of sales and financing for Turkey after September 30, 1978, under the foreign military sales program. An effort will be made to strike that provision of the bill which repeals the partial embargo.

Last week the other body voted to lift the arms embargo against Turkey by a vote of 57 to 42 after adopting additional language offered by the distinguished Senate majority leader (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD) setting forth certain U.S. policy guidelines with respect to Cyprus.

The compromise language adopted by the Senate reiterated the high priority we attach to implementing U.N. resolutions calling for the withdrawal of Turkish troops from Cyprus and the restoration of full sovereignty to that island through the negotiation of a just settlement. The Senate language also underscored that any arms transfers to Greece and Turkey be solely for defensive purposes, to insure military balance in the region, and to sustain the strength of the NATO alliance. The language further called for a continuing review by the President and Congress of progress toward a Cyprus settlement as a determinant of future U.S. economic and military policy toward the region. To that end, the Senate-passed bill requires periodic reports by the President to Congress on progress toward a settlement, and certification that any requested arms transfers to the region will contribute to such a settlement.

Mr. Speaker, I would point out that similar language is already contained in section 18 of H.R. 12514 as reported by the Committee on International Relations, including the reporting and certification requirements. It is my understanding that further amendments may be offered to clarify and strengthen those policy guidelines and requirements, and, to the extent that they will enhance the prospects for a peaceful solution of the Cyprus conflict, I intend to support them.

The important thing in all this is that the Congress is not granting an unconditional lifting of the embargo, as some have characterized it. It is quite clear from the language of both the House and Senate bills that our future economic and military policy in the region will be largely shaped by the progress that is made toward a peaceful solution. The lifting of the embargo by no means signals an open ended, multiyear commitment to providing military assistance to any of the countries in the region. At the same time, the lifting of the embargo does recognize that our efforts to date, through the imposition of the embargo, have not elicited the positive response some had hoped it would. Instead, it has produced the opposite effect of prolonging the stalemate on negotiations, poisoning our relations with the parties to the dispute, and jeopardizing the security interests of the United States and our NATO allies. As Secretary of State Vance put it in his House testimony:

Continued maintenance of the embargo would be harmful to U.S. security concerns, harmful to our bilateral relations with Turkey and harmful to our role as a potential contributor to a Cyprus settlement.

Elaborating on the security implications of continuing the embargo, Secretary of Defense Brown offered the following testimony:

Unless our security relationship with Turkey is returned to a sound footing, Turkey's sense of isolation will continue to grow, and nationalistic pressures will edge it toward a search for possible non-NATO sources to satisfy its defense requirements. Such an eventuality, we judge, would not be in Turkey's best interests, nor the interests of NATO, nor those of Greece.

I do not think any objective analysis of the situation can deny the vital, strategic importance of Turkey to the security interests of both the United States and the NATO alliance. As our colleague, the ranking minority member on the International Relations Committee (Mr. BROOMFIELD) points out in his supplemental views:

Turkey controls the Dardanelles—a vital gateway to the Mediterranean;

Turkey has numerous strategic military bases;

Turkey is essential to NATO's southern flank and in particular, the U.S. 6th Fleet;

Turkish ground forces, third largest in NATO, can help to counter the Soviet threat; and Turkey has vital U.S. intelligence bases necessary to the monitoring of Soviet conventional and strategic activities.

Nor do I think anyone can deny that this entire situation has deteriorated considerably since the imposition of the embargo, no matter how strong the legal and moral arguments, and no matter how well intentioned the motives of the proponents of the embargo. Mr. Speaker, I would submit that we have exacted our pound of flesh, we have made our point with respect to the use of American-provided arms, and we have punished Turkey. We now have a choice of dwelling on the past or looking to the future. The central question before us today is not whether Turkey acted illegally in invading Cyprus in 1974. Rather, the central questions are whether the continuation of the embargo serves the best interests of the United States, of the NATO alliance, and of the prospects for a peaceful settlement of the Cyprus dispute. There is no guarantee that the lifting of the embargo will be a complete success on all three counts. But there is considerable evidence that the present policy has utterly failed on all three counts.

Finally, I would stress that lifting the embargo does not represent a tilt toward Turkey and against Greece. I think it is abundantly clear from the assistance provided to both countries under this bill that what we are seeking is a military balance and stability in the region that will bring about a tilt toward peace.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of this rule and, at the appropriate time, rejection of any efforts to strike the provision repealing the Turkish arms embargo.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY).

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I wish to congratulate the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) for speaking up so resolutely and, I think, courageously in support of lifting the embargo. I say that with sadness because, as of this moment, he is the first Member of the leadership on either side of the aisle to take that step. I hope he will not be the last, but he is the first.

Mr. Speaker, I asked for this time because over the weekend other Members, I am sure, just as I did, read some accounts in the press forecasting that the votes are in sight to lift the embargo.

Mr. Speaker, I have been working diligently on the effort to lift the embargo for several months now, not just for several days, but for several months, trying to keep track of votes, and influence votes especially on the Republican side of the aisle. In all candor, whoever says that the votes are in sight to lift the embargo just does not know the facts. It will happen, I hope, but the votes certainly are not in place at this moment.

Those who are making that prediction are, I think, overlooking the fact that many of the votes on both sides of the aisle have to be classified as "soft."

Many Members dread voting to lift the embargo because of Greek-American constituencies back home. They dread it as much, I suppose, as Socrates dreaded drinking that hemlock. Moreover, if they get a chance to duck it, they are going to do it.

Mr. Speaker, the worst message they could be given would be a false appraisal of how the vote is going to come out. I would estimate that there are at least 15 Republicans whom we are counting on to vote to lift the embargo, but who really do not want to vote that way; and if they feel that they can get by by taking the other position because somebody else is going to do the duty for them, they will vote against lifting the embargo. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I suspect that there are twice as many on the Democratic side who have to be classified in that column.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PIKE). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY).

Mr. FINDLEY. I hope, as the Members consider this difficult issue, they will not try to leave it to somebody else to do their duty.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. DODD. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 11280

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill H.R. 11280, relating to civil service reform.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. BAUMAN. Reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman from Arizona whether the gentleman from California (Mr. ROUSSELOT) has been consulted on this request?

Mr. UDALL. If the gentleman will yield, I have consulted with the gentleman about 2 minutes ago. The gentleman from California said he no longer has any objection.

Mr. BAUMAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 12931, FOREIGN AID APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1979

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Resolution 1247 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 1247

Resolved, That during the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12931) making appropriations for Foreign Assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for other purposes, all points of order against the following provisions in said bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clauses 2 and 6, rule XXI, are hereby waived: beginning on page 2, line 9 through page 3, line 10; beginning on page 3, line 16 through page 4, line 9; beginning on page 4, lines 13 and 14; beginning on page 4, line 24 through page 5, line 21; beginning on page 6, line 20 through page 8, line 11; beginning on page 8, line 22 through page 9, line 21; beginning on page 13, lines 3 through 8; beginning on page 13, line 17 through page 15, line 3; and beginning on page 22, line 19 through page 23, line 19. It shall be in order to consider the following amendment to said bill if offered by Representative Young of Florida, and all points of order against said amendment are hereby waived:

"On page 23, line 19 insert the following new section:

'SEC. 510. The President shall direct the United States Governor of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the United States Governor of the International Finance Corporation, the United States Governor of the International Development Association, the United States Governor of the Inter-American Development Bank, the United States Governor of the Asian Development Bank, and the United States Governor of the African Development Fund, to propose and seek adoption of an amendment to the Articles of Agreement for their respective institutions to establish human rights standards to be considered in connection with each application for assistance.' "

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BOLLING) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. DEL CLAWSON); pending that, Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution, to the best of my knowledge, is not controversial, although the subject matter is very controversial that will be brought up under it. It provides for a great many waivers of points of order necessitated by the failure of the authorization to be in place; points of order on unauthorized appropriations, points of order on reappropriations.

There is one unusual feature in the rule and that is that it makes in order an amendment, if offered by Representative YOUNG of Florida, dealing with human rights. That amendment appears on page 2 of the rule. It was part of the arrangement made and presented by the Committee on Appropriations and agreed to, as I remember it, overwhelmingly by the Committee on Rules.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DEL CLAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 1247 provides for the consideration of H.R. 12931, the foreign assistance and related programs appropriation bill, 1979. This is an excellent example of the type of rule which is quickly becoming the tranished hallmark of the Rules Committee. It is a rule consisting of one waiver after another.

First, let me point out to my distinguished colleagues that the rule now before us is the second rule to be reported by the Rules Committee. The first rule was superseded after a special meeting of the Rules Committee, which was held on June 22, produced the rule we now consider. Committee members were given a mere 19 hours notice of this meeting. Therefore, some questions have been raised as to the propriety of the meeting, which was deemed an emergency because of the eminent call of H.R. 12931 to the floor. Please note that H.R. 12931 has been pending over 1 month, to this date. The result of this so-called emergency meeting was House Resolution 1247 which is a rule that is substantially different from the first rule reported by the Rules Committee.

The resolution first waives clause 2, of rule 21, which prohibits unauthorized appropriations and legislation on general appropriation bills. At the time this bill was passed by the Rules Committee, a mere 37 percent of the excessive $7.3 billion recommended in the bill had completed the authorization process. Passage of the rule for H.R. 12514 has not alleviated my concern over this apparent circumvention of the authorizing committees and the entire authorization process. Nor has it alleviated the need for the waiver.

Furthermore, I would like to draw attention to the fact that the Rules Committee has opted to legislate in this appropriation bill by use of waivers. The first resolution reported by the Rules Committee did not contain a waiver for sections 508 and 509 of H.R. 12931. The rule now before us does contain such a waiver. Matters of great and far-reaching importance are contained in these sections. Members are encouraged to examine carefully and to exercise their wisdom concerning the issues dealt with here.

The rule further waives all points of order lying against specified portions of the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 6, rule 21, which prohibits provisions reappropriating unexpended balances of prior appropriations. Although it is a common practice to reappropriate unspent balances, we must not allow ourselves to grow lax when dealing with such exceptionally large sums of the taxpapers' money.

Finally, the rule waives all points of order against the amendment, printed in the rule, of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG).

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I again point out to my distinguished colleagues the enormous appropriation in this bill. Do we have sufficient justification for giving away $7.3 billion when our national debt is already $755 billion?

Mr. Speaker, I recommend a no vote on the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, having no requests for time, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TABLING HOUSE RESOLUTION 1239

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to lay on the table House Resolution 1239, waiving certain points of order against the bill H.R. 12931, making appropriations for foreign assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for other purposes. This rule is not needed because we have just adopted House Resolution 1247.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

FOREIGN AID AUTHORIZATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1979

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12514) to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act to authorize international security assistance programs for fiscal year 1979, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 317, nays 11, not voting 104, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 12514, with Mr. FUQUA in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

As designated by the chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZA-BLOCKI), the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) will be recognized for 1 hour, and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, under the rule, it is my understanding that the 1 hour for general debate on the entire bill, that that hour is equally divided between myself and the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD).

Then the 2 hours that the rule provides for the Greek-Turkey-Cyprus issue, that there be 1 hour in support of lifting the embargo and 1 hour in opposition, and that the hour in support would be divided between myself and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD), and those in opposition to lifting the embargo would be managed by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will respond to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) that the Chair has been informed that the gentleman from Wisconsin has designated the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) for 1 hour, and also the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) for 1 hour. The rule, of course, does not confine any such debate to the embargo issue alone.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, half of that, one-half of the 2 hours is for support of the committee's position and one-half in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin, wishing to designate himself to control one-half of the majority time?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, on the Democratic side, I designate myself in support of the committee's position and one-half hour for the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL).

As to the Republican side, I allocate one-half hour of the hour to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD) and one-half hour to the gentlemen from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the chairman of the committee has the authority to so designate the time if he wishes to designate it in that manner.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Unless there are any requests for changes on the part of the minority, Mr. Chairman, I submit that is my designation.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, on the part of the minority, I would like to suggest the designation of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKSI) to have one-half hour for the retention of the embargo and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) to have one-half hour in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will so designate.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 12514, the International Security Assistance Act of 1978, is perhaps the most important piece of legislation in the foreign policy field and to the interests of U.S. national security to come before the Congress this session. Because of its significance members of the International Relations Committee worked especially hard and, I think, effectively and responsibly on this bill.

If there is one message that this measure conveys abroad it is this: The United States will stand behind our friends and will never fall behind our adversaries.

H.R. 12514 authorizes funding for grant military assistance, foreign military credit sales, international peacekeeping operations, narcotics control, and the contingency fund.

Among the important foreign policy issues contained in H.R. 12514 are the lifting of the Turkish arms embargo and the U.S. troop withdrawal plan for Korea. In working its will on such crucial questions I am confident Congress will demonstrate its wisdom and good sense. By providing prudent policy guidance on military assistance matters Congress will be exercising its legitimate interest to help shape U.S. foreign policy.

Mr. Chairman, there are times when the overuse of words or phrases leads us to slide over words without appreciating their true meaning and value. It may be that the words "United States" have suffered that fate.

The point of all this is what I said a moment ago: The chief objective of H.R. 12514 is to uphold U.S. national security interests. While this bill does contain policy provisions related to many different countries it is chiefly concerned with the best interests of the United States. That in my judgment should be the only criteria on which we should vote on this bill.

I feel that the $999.3 million this bill authorizes for appropriations in fiscal year 1979 is needed to achieve vital U.S. national security objectives abroad in the areas of security assistance and foreign military sales.

H.R. 12514 is the result of 27 hearings by the Committee on International Relations and its subcommittees.

Recommendations by the committee, subcommittees, and by an ad hoc group of committee members established to consider the so-called Humphrey bill on foreign assistance reorganization were incorporated into H.R. 12514. Although section 16, lifting the Turkish arms embargo was adopted by a narrow vote of 18 to 17, the bill was ordered favorably reported by the Committee on International Relations on May 3 by a voice vote, a quorum being present.

Because vital U.S. national security interests are involved, the committee devoted a major part of its time and effort this year to consideration of our policy concerning Greece and Turkey. Testimony was received from Members of Congress, executive branch, and public witnesses. The committee also heard the firsthand views of the principals involved in the conflict over Cyprus: the Prime Minister of Greece and Turkey, Mr. Karamanlis and Mr. Ecevit, as well as the President of Cyprus, Mr. Kyprianou, and the Turkish Cypriot leader, Mr. Denktash.

The Greece-Turkey-Cyprus issue will be discussed at length. The rule provides 2 hours of debate for that purpose and I will not dwell on that issue at this time.

GRANT MILITARY ASSISTANCE

The bill authorizes $163.4 million for grant military assistance programs for fiscal year 1979, a reduction of $65.4 million from the $228.9 million authorized last year. Moreover, the bill continues the policy of phasing out grant military assistance by reducing from 8 to 5 the number of countries authorized to receive such assistance and the number of Armed Forces personnel from 865 to 800 that may be assigned overseas to perform security assistance management functions.

GRANT MILITARY TRAINING

For grant military education and training, the bill authorizes $32.1 million, an increase of $1.1 million over that authorized for this program in fiscal year 1978. However, despite the increase in program funds, the number of students receiving training through the program will be reduced because of inflationary increases and by further implementation of full costing procedures by the Department of State.

FMS CREDIT GUARANTEES

H.R. 12514 authorizes appropriations of $674.3 million to finance an overall foreign military sales credit program of $2 billion 085.5 million. This is $2.7 million less than the $677 million which Congress authorized in last year's legislation while the aggregate ceiling is almost $16.9 million less than the $2 billion 102.35 million set for fiscal year 1978.

In authorizing appropriations for FMS credit Congress make available 10 percent of the principal amount of the loan extended to foreign countries to purchase U.S. defense articles and services. This 10 percent is used by the Department of Defense as a guarantee of loans extended by the Federal Financing Bank. As in past years, the authorization also makes available $1 billion to Israel and provides terms used in prior years: $500 million of the credit is forgiven; repayment shall be in not less than 20 years, following a grace period of 10 years on repayment of principal.

PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS AND OTHER PROGRAMS

The peacekeeping operations funds authorized in section 11 of H.R. 12514 had in past years been programed under security supporting assistance. Because of recommendations made by the ad hoc group of committee members studying the Humphrey bill, the bulk of security supporting assistance funds are now authorized in H.R. 12222 the International Development and Food Assistance Act of 1978 which the House passed on May 15.

The separation of these funds into two accounts reflects committee recognition of the fact that major portions of what was formerly security supporting assistance should properly be considered economic aid. By contrast, the funds authorized in this bill under peacekeeping operations are related more directly to the national security interests of the United States.

The $29.4 million authorized in H.R. 12514 will fund the Sinai Support Mission to monitor the demarcation line in the Sinai and United Nations forces in Cyprus, support commitments undertaken by the 1976 Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation with Spain, and provide $2 million for a Middle East special requirements fund. The latter will enable the United States to respond expeditiously to unforeseen requirements for funds to promote Middle East regional security.

Additionally, the bill authorizes the appropriation of $40 million for the international narcotics control program for fiscal year 1979, an increase of $1 million over last year. The bill also authorizes $10 million for a contingency fund which is $5 million more than the authorization for fiscal year 1978. The contingency fund is rarely used but gives the President the ability to meet unusual emergency situations as the needs arise.

Finally, H.R. 12514 contains provisions that clarify and add to existing human rights law applicable to security assistance. It also expresses the sense of Congress that a balanced approach should be taken in implementing conventional arms transfer policy and requires quarterly reports on security assistance surveys.

These are the major authorizations for appropriation in the bill. Altogether the bill authorizes $27 million less than Congress provided for similar programs for fiscal year 1978.

In closing, I believe that the members of the Committee on International Relations deserve full credit for the hard work and many hours of careful consideration that, on a bipartisan basis, have been devoted to this bill. I want to also note and pay tribute to the staff for their untiring efforts in assisting in the preparation of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, as I stated earlier, H.R. 12514 serves our national security interest and those of our allies. It also demonstrates responsible congressional oversight over the security assistance and arms transfer programs of the United States.

The bill demonstrates that the House can exercise its oversight role over foreign policy with wisdom, good judgment, and a careful and responsible attitude toward this Nation's national security. It deserves endorsement and I urge my colleagues to vote for H.R. 12514.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, in light of the ominous projection of Soviet military power worldwide, our need for collective security is greater than ever before. In the last year, for example, the Soviet Union has escalated its challenge to the United States throughout the world, especially in Africa, the Near East, and Europe.

Of particular concern has been the increasing naval strength of the Soviet Union. Seapower, as evidenced by the new Kiev-class ships, has probably been the most dynamic military element in the Soviet Union's attempt to attain mobility and flexibility in globally projecting power—and thus extracting political and strategic benefits worldwide. To be sure, the extensive Soviet shipbuilding program, demonstrates the Soviet Union's intense interest in exploiting the seas for economic, political, and military purposes. As a recent report by the Atlantic Council concluded, the Soviet Union seeks military superiority for political purposes and will continue to improve its armed forces, giving it the opportunities to exploit any power vacuum or imbalance of power.

Geopolitically, the Soviets, with growing ground, air, and seapower, are especially intent upon outflanking our Near Eastern friends and West European allies. As King Hassan of Morocco recently stated regarding Soviet aims:

> I agree with those who say it is to encircle, weaken and neutralize Western Europe. . . .

In particular, the Soviets have demonstrated their lack of interest in any peaceful solutions to Near East problems with their transfer of sophisticated conventional arms to radical African and Arab States, as well as the Warsaw Pact. In this regard, I believe that H.R. 12514 can help to offset the Soviet Union's encirclement of the Near East by providing essential support to our friends and allies in that region. Moreover, through such support, we can better encourage peace negotiations in that area of the world.

By providing for security of our Near Eastern friends—which H.R. 12514 helps to do—the United States takes an important step in the overall improvement of our collective security. The Near East—with its sea-lanes to the Persian Gulf, the Black, Aegean, and Mediterranean Seas, and the Indian Ocean—is a strategic economic and military crossroads. Moreover, this area is important to the security of the Western alliance and in particular, the NATO structure.

The security of Western Europe and the Near East assumes timely and strategic importance in light of recent military buildups in nearby African, Arab, and Warsaw Pact countries. At this time the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies have established a conventional military superiority over NATO forces in Western Europe. Moreover, Soviet forces in Europe have undergone significant expansion in the past decade and are now being qualitatively improved with new weaponry such as the Backfire bomber and the SS-20 mobile missile. At a recent meeting NATO defense ministers noted that the military disparity between NATO and the Warsaw Pact continues to widen.

In particular, the projection of Soviet power in the eastern Mediterranean poses numerous problems to our good friends on the southern flank of NATO. In order to confront the growing threat from the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact, it is extremely important that our good friends and longtime allies on the southern flank continue to work out their political, economic and military differences. In this regard, I believe that the legislation that we have before us will help to encourage an accommodation in the eastern Mediterranean which will be in the best interests of all parties to the Atlantic alliance. Moreover, H.R. 12514 will not only strengthen the structure of NATO, but also provide for the maintenance of our overall worldwide security interests and, as a result act as an important counter to the ever-growing Soviet threat.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, I believe the legislation we have before us is vital to our country's security and strategic interests. I urge your support of H.R. 12514.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. WINN).

Mr. WINN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 12514, the International Security Assistance Act of 1978.

The legislation that we have before us today is important to our national and collective security. In particular, the legislation provides for the maintenance of our worldwide security interests be they in Europe, the Near East, or Northeast Asia.

I believe that with the ever-growing Soviet arms buildup, there is a great need for the United States to join its good friends and allies in seeking new and better ways to collective security.

In this regard, I believe that H.R. 12514 can help to counter the Soviet threat by providing necessary support to such good friends and allies as Greece, Turkey, and Israel.

In particular, H.R. 12514 lifts the arms embargo against Turkey and provides for the transfer of U.S. military equipment to South Korea, now that the administration has decided to withdraw our ground troops from Korea. I believe that it is time to lift the embargo, largely because the embargo has been a dismal failure in relation to a Cyprus settlement. The embargo has also jeopardized NATO's security.

The bill we have before us today also is important, because it provides for less money than last year's legislation thus reflecting the taxpayers' concerns. Moreover, the legislation—under section 20—reduces Federal paperwork by repealing provisions in past foreign assistance legislation calling for one-time or redundant foreign policy reports.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, under this first phase of the rule, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time of the 30 minutes allotted to me in this first phase.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ).

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, this is unquestionably a very difficult and complex issue. It is for me one of the most difficult and complex questions which I have confronted ever since coming to the Congress 4 years ago. It has been complex, because of the intractability of the issues involved and it has been difficult, because of the extent to which many of my constituents care passionately about the continuation of the embargo against Turkey.

Had I been a Member of this House in 1974, when the embargo was first imposed, I would have voted for that legislation, because I believe that it was legally required and politically prudent. After coming here in 1975, as a member of the Committee on International Relations, I decided to go out to the Eastern Mediterranean, and to take a look at the situation in that troubled part of the world. After going to Greece and Turkey, and to the Greek and Turkish sectors of Cyprus, and talking at length with Prime Minister Demirel of Turkey and Foreign Minister Bitsios of Greece, and the leader of the Greek community in Cyprus, Archbishop Makarios, and the leader of the Turkish Cypriot community, Mr. Denktash, I came to the conclusion that the embargo had been completely counterproductive.

I had the opportunity to return to the Eastern Mediterranean 4 months ago, and once again I engaged in a round of conversations with the leaders of all of the countries and communities involved. I came away more convinced than ever that, whatever the merits of the embargo when it was first imposed after the invasion of Cyprus, it was now clear that the embargo had not accomplished the objectives which it was originally designed to achieve.

I think it is fairly clear that, when the embargo was first imposed, there were three main reasons for imposing it.

The first was to uphold the so-called rule of law and to carry out what a majority of the Members of the Congress interpreted as our obligation under the law to terminate the future sale of American arms to a country; namely, Turkey—which had violated the restrictions which had been imposed on them.

Second, the purpose of the embargo was to reinforce the credibility of our restrictions on the use of American arms, not only in the eastern Mediterranean, but everywhere else in the world where we sell them as well.

And, third, the proponents of the embargo told us that through the enactment of this legislation we would be able to put the kind of pressure on Turkey which would enable us to extract from the Turks the kind of concessions which were necessary for a resolution of the Cyprus problem.

Four years later, 4 years after the embargo, which, from a military point of view, has gone a long way toward enfeebling one of the most important countries in the NATO alliance, what has happened? First, insofar as the rule of law is concerned, I think we can fairly say to the Members of the Congress and to the people of this country that the rule of law has been upheld. The embargo was imposed and we met our obligations under the law as it was written at that time. But there is nothing in the law which requires the embargo to remain in existence in perpetuity. Having upheld the law for the last 4 years, we now have to make the determination as to whether or not it is in the American interest—not in the Greek interest, not in the Turkish interest, not in the Cypriot interest—but whether or not it is in the American interest to continue the embargo.

Second, I would submit that we demonstrated that the restrictions which we impose on the use of our arms do have teeth in them. Turkey has suffered, and suffered substantially, as a result of the imposition of the embargo. I think it is fair to say that literally every country in the world, which has been the recipient of American arms, is now on notice that if they violate the terms under which we sell them those arms, they, too face the possibility that such an embargo will be imposed on them.

Third, insofar as the argument is concerned that only by putting this kind of pressure on Turkey can we expect to get a resolution of the problem on Cyprus, I think it is clear that the embargo has made things worse rather than better in terms of achieving a resolution of this very difficult dispute. The fact of the matter is that so long as the embargo remains in existence the chance of achieving an agreement on Cyprus will be virtually nonexistent. The Turks, in the final analysis, are unlikely to make the kind of ultimate concessions, under the pressure of an embargo, which will be necessary for an agreement. And the Greek Cypriots, who very much want the embargo to continue, because they truly believe that only by continuing the embargo can they hope to get the right kind of concessions, are unwilling to even enter into intercommunal discussions with the Turkish Cypriots, out of fear of legitimatizing the impression here in Congress that progress is being made toward the resolution of the conflict on Cyprus, thereby strengthening the possibility of eliminating the embargo altogether.

Let me be absolutely clear about one thing: There is no guarantee that if we lift the embargo the conflict on Cyprus will be settled, but we can be virtually certain that if the embargo is not lifted, the chance of reaching an agreement will be virtually nil. In this sense, I think the elimination of the embargo is a necessary, if not a sufficient condition for a resolution of the dispute over Cyprus.

A number of the Members of this House, who originally voted for the embargo have said:

> If only there were some indications that the Turks were flexible and were prepared to make a few concessions, we could justify voting to eliminate the embargo on the grounds that the government in Ankara had shown some good faith.

Let me say to my colleagues in the House that if they carefully review the record of the last few months they will realize that the Government of Turkey has made a number of significant concessions which constitute a significant manifestation of the interest of the new Government in Turkey in genuinely resolving this very difficult dispute.

First, just a few months ago, the Government of Turkey submitted very detailed constitutional proposals which Secretary General Waldheim of the United Nations termed "concrete and substantial."

Second, since the invasion of Cyprus, the Turks have withdrawn over 17,000 troops from Cyprus, and since April of this year they have withdrawn up to 2,500 troops from Cyprus. Furthermore, in this regard, the Turks have made it clear that in the context of the settlement of the Cyprus dispute, they are prepared to withdraw all of their forces from Turkey, except those which the agreement would entitle them to keep on the island.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. SOLARZ. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots have been accused of inflexibility, but is it not correct that from the moment President Carter called for the lifting of the embargo, things began to happen? A lot of forward movement occurred that I think should cause all of us to take comfort and hope that even better things will follow.

Mr. SOLARZ. This is precisely the point I was trying to make, and I thank the gentleman for reinforcing it.

I think the Turks since April have made six significant concessions. I pointed to two. Let me point to a third. They have also offered to consider making substantial territorial concessions on Cyprus in the context of an agreement with the Greek Cypriot community.

Fourth, they have agreed to permit Greek Cypriot refugees—up to 35,000—to return to Verusha under a U.N. administration.

Fifth, they have agreed to reopen, once the intercommunal talks resume, the airport at Nicosia for civilian traffic, perhaps under U.N. auspices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SOLARZ. I thank the chairman for yielding.

Finally, the Turks have emphasized over and over again that the concessions to which I have already referred are the opening rather than the final position with which they are prepared to resume the intercommunal talks. They have said that they are flexible with respect to these conditions and are prepared, once the negotiations are resumed, to make more concessions.

Have the Turks gone far enough? Of course not. Should they make more concessions? Of course they should. But have they demonstrated a good-faith effort to resolve this conflict? I think the answer is "yes," and I think the Congress should reflect that recognition by voting now, 4 years after it was first established, to eliminate the embargo.

There is fundamentally one of two ways in which this dispute over Cyprus is going to be resolved. Either it is going to be resolved on the basis of a unilateral withdrawal by Turkey from Cyprus and a consequent reestablishment of the status quo ante, or it will be resolved in the context of a bilateral negotiation between the Greeks and the Turks and the two communities on Cyprus. I think it is self-evident that, however, this dispute is resolved, it will not be resolved purely on the basis of a unilateral Turkish withdrawal from Cyprus. The Turks can no more be expected to withdraw unilaterally from Cyprus than the Israelis can be expected to withdraw unilaterally from the territories they occupied in the 1967 war against the Arabs. If there is going to be a resolution of the Cyprus dispute, it will have to be on the basis of a negotiation, and if we are going to get a negotiation going, we are going to have to lift the embargo. There is virtually no chance whatsoever, if this embargo continues in existence, of getting meaningful concessions from the Turks, let alone a meaningful negotiation underway, for all of the reasons I have already described.

May I in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, offer one other argument in favor of the elimination of the embargo against Turkey, and that is that at a time when there is a growing concern not only in our country, but throughout the Western World about the Soviet buildup in Eastern Europe, and the development of a dangerous conventional imbalance between NATO and the Warsaw Pact, at a time when we are significantly increasing our own expenditures for defense in order to counter that buildup of Eastern forces in Europe, it seems to me to make no sense whatsoever to pursue and perpetuate a policy which not only has made it virtually impossible for Turkey to fulfill its NATO obligations, but which over the course of time runs the risk of actually driving Turkey out of the NATO Alliance itself.

The fact of the matter is that Turkey now has the second largest ground force in NATO, over a half million men who are committed to the defense of Western Europe. Together with Greece, they tie up over 26 Soviet divisions, which were Turkey at some point in the future to withdraw from NATO, could very easily be shifted to the even more critical central sector.

Second, by virtue of their geographic location and their control of the Bosporus and the Dardanelles, the Turks are in a position to bottle up the Soviet Black Sea fleet and to enable us, through our own 6th Fleet in the Mediterranean, to establish naval control of that absolutely critical waterway.

Third, Turkey provides the 6th Fleet with up to 1 additional hour of warning time in the event that the Soviets and their Warsaw Pact allies should launch a surprise attack in the Eastern Mediterranean. An amount of time that could mean the difference between survival and annihilation in the event of another war.

Finally, I think it is fair to say that if, through a perpetuation of the embargo, we were to drive Turkey out of NATO, not only would we suffer, not only would NATO suffer, but Greece itself would suffer, because without Turkey to shore up the Southern flank of NATO, the real threat to Greece, which comes not from Ankara but from Moscow, would be substantially increased.

Mr. Chairman, we are going to hear a lot of comment in the next few hours about principle, and I believe in principle, too; but what about the principle of maintaining a conventional balance of power in Europe so that we can avoid the possibility of a third world war?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) has again expired.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ).

Mr. SOLARZ. This really is my final point. What about the principle of supporting democracy in the developing world? We are going to be taking up the foreign aid appropriations bill later this week and we are going to have a whole raft of amendments designed to withdraw funds from countries that have violated human rights. Perhaps we should move in that direction; but Turkey is one of the few countries in the developing world which has a genuine commitment to democracy. And, I think we have an obligation to strengthen the forces of democracy in that country.

There is a struggle for the soul of Turkey which is now underway in that country between those who would move it in a Western direction, who believe in the principles of democracy to which our own country is committed, and those who would move it away from the West, perhaps in a more neutralist or nonalined or even in an Islamic direction, who are not sympathetic to the principles of democracy in which we believe.

And there can be little doubt that, if the embargo is continued, we will undermine the forces of democracy in Turkey, and strengthen the forces of reaction.

On the other hand, if we do eliminate the embargo, what will we have accomplished?

First, we will have reinforced and strengthened NATO and its vital southern flank.

Second, we will have created conditions which will make possible real progress in the Cyprus dispute.

Third, we will reinforce those forces within Turkey which are committed to democracy and a close relationship with the West.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I would be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to congratulate my friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) on what I consider to be a thoroughly brilliant exposition of the issue. I do not know of any member of the committee in my experience who has been more diligent and better prepared for a wide range of issues and the gentleman certainly has demonstrated that competence here today.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, after my friends, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) referred to the statement of the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) as "brilliant," I am wondering why I bother to take the well. But we have to balance this argument.

I appreciate the fact that a great deal of rhetoric is going to go into this debate this afternoon and tomorrow. Much of it may well be repetitious. Let us take a look at the facts before us. There really are not too many to consider.

The fact is that in August of 1974 there was an invasion of the island of Cyprus by the Turks. As a result of that invasion, which was successful since the Cypriot armed forces were not then or now a potent military force, the Turks occupied about 40 percent of the island. In the process over 200,000 people found themselves in the tragic situation of being refugees.

That was 4 years ago, 4 years ago this August. The situation is still the same. The number of refugees really has not diminished. The occupation remains substantially the same.

The concessions the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) speaks about are more cosmetic than real. They do not involve large chunks of real estate; they do not involve the port of Famagusta, which was one of the keys to the thriving economy of Cyprus before 1974.

So what we really have is a 4-year-old status quo—a status quo which consists of an invasion and an occupation in which U.S. military arms were used in contradiction to our law. That is the issue.

The argument over whether or not the Turks may shift left or right, closer to or farther from NATO, begs the original question. The original question is: Was their invasion justified? By an overwhelming vote on each occasion since 1974, and including one in May 1977, the Congress has said: That the invasion was not justified, and the embargo that we imposed was justified.

Now, some argue that since, after 4 years of maintaining this very proper embargo, it has not produced the needed concessions, then we should drop it, that would be in my opinion a false premise on which the Congress should base any action. Following that reasoning, those who advocate an embargo against Rhodesia, might as well join us in lifting that embargo. What about those who at various times have advocated the imposition of sanctions against Indonesia, Chile, Argentina, and other countries for violating regional security measures or some concept of human rights? After an embargo is imposed, the argument that because, after a period of time, the embargo has not achieved its purpose and, therefore, should be lifted is, indeed, a shallow one.

As I see it, Mr. Chairman, the issue is this: Congress wisely imposed the embargo 4 years ago. Nothing really has changed. To be consistent with our votes in the past, I suggest we maintain that embargo.

Now, the political facts of life are that a few members of the majority party will switch from their previous position. This is understandable, with the communications and pressures from the Carter White House. It is my hope that an equal number of members on the minority side will switch their positions, since they are no longer under the type of pressure that was exerted by the White House in the Kissinger era. If that happens, the balance of the votes will find Congress back in the position of sustaining the embargo until there is some real progress in Cyprus.

In an age in which we have come close to upsetting relations with the Soviet Union, because three or four dissidents were being tried simultaneously, one wonders about the 200,000 refugees who have been stripped of their property, stripped of their personal possessions, and stripped of their investments are completely forgotten.

Since we are going through an era in the House of championing human rights, individual as well as group rights, I would suggest that the 200,000 Greek Cypriot refugees on Cyprus merit our attention as much as the Soviet dissidents. They merit the protection of Congress, they merit the interest of Congress, and they merit the consistent support of Congress.

If anything is going to budge the Government of Turkey, it is not going to be a unilateral lifting of the embargo; it will be the House insisting the embargo be maintained until there is good, solid, substantial progress on Cyprus. Until then there is no basis, in my judgment, for lifting the embargo.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. McKINNEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been told to us about the political situation in Turkey. And yet we hear very little mentioned about the political situation in Greece. Is not this the very reason that just a few years ago we were concerned about the continuation of democracy and the existence of a free republic, and is not that all the more reason why to change ships in the middle of this channel would be a very dangerous thing?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I think the gentleman is correct.

I did not want to make the point at this time, since it would sound like a threat that the Greeks would move left if the Congress shifted its position.

The facts of life are that the anti-Karamanlis minority in the Greek Government, led by Mr. Papandreou, who has a record of anti-Americanism that dates back many years, would be perfectly capable of exploiting this issue and using it against the best interests of the government of Mr. Karamanlis which at the present time has the majority in the Greek Parliament.

Mr. McKINNEY. If the gentleman will yield further, is it not also true that the Government of Turkey has stated publicly they will stay in NATO regardless of what we do in this policy?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I think any government, the Turkish Government, of the Government of Iceland, for example, at the other end, will remain in NATO as long as it serves their practical interest. I believe that the membership of Turkey in NATO serves their practical interest, and that should be the main reason why they remain active members.

Mr. McKINNEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose very strongly, lifting the embargo on Turkey. During the 5-minute rule I shall offer an amendment, for myself and other colleagues, to strike the language in the bill which lifts the embargo. If the Turkish Government, as has been suggested, is making such forthcoming concessions with respect to the settlement of the matter of Cyprus, I suggest that they go right ahead and do it. There is nothing in the embargo, as such, that prevents them from doing it—and the quicker they get about it, the better off we will all be.

I would be slightly amused—if it were amusing—at the suggestion that I have heard and the colloquy that in some way the United States is responsible for what has happened in Cyprus or the relationships that exist between the Turkish Government and the Greek Government. I really do not understand that—as if the United States is at fault in some way for what has happened to two good friends who are involved with us in NATO. I do not understand why the United States has the sole responsibility for action and is accused of standing in the way of the settlement of an issue which is irritating, annoying, potentially explosive, and frustrating everybody.

What are the Turks waiting on? Certainly it is not the lifting of the embargo. The embargo could not possibly have had any effect on the Turks. Since the embargo has been in effect, they have gotten $600 million from the United States. How much more money do they want?

Even in this bill wherein it is suggested that the embargo be lifted, the program for military assistance to Turkey in fiscal year 1979 is at the same rate that it has been under the embargo. So lifting of the embargo is not connected to the receipt of more U.S. arms in fiscal year 1979—but what of fiscal year 1980 and thereafter?

How does that inhibit the Turkish Government from doing what is right? Which is to settle the Cyprus issue. If it is right, why do they not go and do it? If it is wrong that there are 200,000 refugees on Cyprus, why do not the Turks correct it?

If it is wrong that the Turks invaded Cyprus and the U.N. said that they should get out with their troops, why do they not get out? If it was wrong under our law that they used our arms to invade Cyprus and they are still there with our arms, and if that is a violation of our law, why do they not send the arms and the troops back? Then the Turkish Government would be in complete consonance with both the U.N. resolution and U.S. law.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is absolutely ridiculous to predicate this discussion on the basis that the United States is wrong in some respect. If something was wrong, it is a fact that the Turks invaded Cyprus in the second invasion which was 4 years ago this month, having happened in August of 1974, and they are still there.

Mr. Chairman, as far as the United States is concerned, we have provided assistance to two allies who are in a serious dispute. It is in our interests, if we are going to look at the matter strictly selfishly, from the U.S. point of view, that that dispute be settled. If our two allies saw things as we see them, they would settle that dispute tonight because, Mr. Chairman, the embargo does not have anything—and everybody knows it does not have anything—to do with the settlement of that dispute.

As a matter of fact, the argument is made contrarywise. The argument is made that the embargo has not been effective at all; and because it has not worked, we ought to, therefore, get rid of it and do something else.

"However," one speaker said, "we want to caution you now that we are not making any promises. We are not saying that if you lift that embargo, anything is going to happen tomorrow."

Mr. Chairman, I do not blame the gentleman for filing a disclaimer today, because I agree with him. I do not think it is either, because the issue is not the embargo in settling that dispute. That dispute can be settled only by the parties. If the United States had the power, it would settle that dispute today.

Mr. Chairman, let me ask one further question: What is it that the Turkish Government fears? Is it the United States? It cannot be. We have continued to provide substantial arms to Turkey. Is it the Greeks? Militarily, the Turks have the Greeks outnumbered 5 to 1.

Mr. Chairman, in terms of military assistance, in the last 12 years the Greeks have received about $2 billion and the Turks about $5 billion from the United States. As far as fiscal year 1979 is concerned, in this very bill, we get on an even footing: $175 million for each country.

If that is fair, as the proponents who want to lift the embargo suggest, it is fair with me. However, the basic fact remains that the Turks are on Cyprus. They have 40 percent of the land. They have their troops there. They are not moving. There is no settlement. In other words, it is clear that the Turks have the position and the power and intend to use the embargo as an excuse.

Mr. Chairman, I would hope that the parties could settle the dispute; but I say this: It would be absolutely wrong for the United States at this point to lift the embargo as a matter of principle, even though politically, as a matter of symbolism, the embargo has not had any effect on Turkey.

The point is, Mr. Chairman, that only the Turks and Greeks can settle the issues of Cyprus. To maintain that the Turks cannot settle, because the United States has an embargo on United States arms to Turkey, notwithstanding that the United States has furnished substantial military assistance to Turkey, is an attempt to confuse or ignore the basic problem—the restoration of the integrity and sovereignty of Cyprus.

The embargo is a response to U.S. law—it should be no bar to the settlement of a serious dispute. The embargo should not be lifted.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, my friend from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) raised the question as to why we do not consider just as expeditiously lifting the embargo against Rhodesia; perhaps doing the same for Argentina or Indonesia—if we had an embargo in place. It suggests that he is overlooking a very important fact that has not really been emphasized in the debate so far today.

We are bound with Turkey by a very unique obligation. We are committed, through the North Atlantic Treaty, to defend the territory of Turkey, as well as of Greece and other members of the NATO Alliance, as if that were our own territory. In other words, we have decided that the community of interests between the people of our country and the people of Turkey is so deep, so intimate, so interrelated in so many ways, that we feel that any threat upon the territory of Turkey must be viewed exactly the same as if our own territory were threatened.

Now, we have no such compact with Rhodesia; we have no alliance of any nature with Rhodesia, nor do we have with Argentina or Indonesia so far as I am aware, so it is not surprising that we would take with greater sensitivity insults that are perceived by our close ally, Turkey, an insult that takes the form, of course, of the embargo against sales of U.S. military equipment to that government. The statement was made that Ecevit has promised that he will stay in NATO even if the embargo stays in place. I take him at his word that that will be his objective, but is there any assurance that Mr. Ecevit would remain in power if this body tomorrow should make the most unfortunate decision of rejecting the language which terminates the embargo? Who knows what might happen in Turkey? The Ecevit government might fall. Indeed, democracy itself might disappear from that country. And there is a growing force and restiveness in those factions in Turkish politics that are urging Turkey to assume a neutral defense posture and worse. They are using the embargo to demonstrate the necessity for such a turn. These forces will become increasingly difficult for Prime Minister Ecevit to control. It will be recalled that former Turkish Prime Minister Demirel did not himself wish at first to close U.S. bases, but did so eventually, if reluctantly, in response to similar domestic pressures.

I think it is far better for us to give a chance for the reconciliation of the great misery on Cyprus, a reconciliation which can follow the lifting of the embargo. It is very true, as the gentleman from Florida suggested, that we have authorized the sale—the sale on credit to be paid in hard money—of military equipment during this interim period, but it is also true that a considerable amount of grant military assistance that had been approved, had been appropriated, was in the pipeline when the embargo was imposed, and has been kept in the pipeline and has never been delivered.

The real problem for Turkey is not so much the denial of military support, but the insult represented by the embargo itself. No proud nation—no proud nation is going to make the reforms that we all want so much on the island of Cyprus under an insult of that character. It is true, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) said, that there is no guarantee that a settlement will occur on Cyprus, but the prospect is there—the great promise is there based upon what Mr. Ecevit and Mr. Denktash have assured us.

To the contrary, if the embargo is not lifted—if the embargo is not lifted, can anyone really say with confidence that the refugees on Cyprus will soon return to their homes; that their misery will end; that that island will once more be returned to a harmonious state? No. The denial by this body of lifting the embargo will, I feel, seal the fate of that unhappy island, and insure that the misery will continue.

Since the imposition of the embargo, Turkey has received $600 million in military equipment, but this does not mean the embargo has been meaningless. Quite the contrary.

Some proponents of the embargo would like to have it both ways. They say the embargo has been meaningless but let us keep it in place. They argue that Turkey has received much military aid under the embargo. Would they have us return to a total embargo then?

Actually, the embargo has had a devastating effect on Turkey above and beyond the humiliation and political difficulties it continues to pose for a longtime friend and ally:

Supreme Allied Commander Haig has stated that the embargo has caused a 50 percent deterioration in Turkish military capabilities. Turkish force preparedness is below NATO standards.

FMS credits extended to Turkey have, in good part, been used to purchase F–4 aircraft. This has been necessary to replace Turkish aircraft of immediate post World War II vintage (F–86's). This aircraft is intended for NATO purposes. Because of this large buy, the embargo has not permitted Turkey to purchase the spare parts needed to maintain other weapons system.

Approximately $70 million in equipment financed under the military assistance grant program before the embargo was imposed will be released from the pipeline. Most of these items are in storage and can be delivered quickly.

With the embargo lifted, we will be able to give permission to our European allies to sell or transfer U.S.-origin or licensed equipment to Turkey. The Germans, the Dutch, and others have aircraft and other equipment which we know they would be willing to transfer to Turkey once the embargo is lifted.

We will then be able to resume military training for Turkish personnel in the United States—an item of great importance to the Turks.

There would no longer be an annual ceiling on foreign military sales transactions with Turkey. While we have sought only $175 million in credit authority in 1979—same as in 1978—with the lifting of the embargo Turkey could make additional cash purchases through Defense Department channels.

Finally, we would be able to intensify joint planning with Turkish military authorities to find ways to work together in the future to deal with Turkey's force obsolescence problems.

Mr. Chairman, U.S. interests compel Congress to lift the arms embargo against Turkey. And it is proper that we view this issue primarily from the perspective of our own interests rather than the vantage point of other nations.

Happily, however, by lifting the arms embargo, we would coincidentally secure not only our own interests but those of our friends and allies in Europe, including Greece, Turkey, and Cyprus.

With our alliance partners we share a need for a strong NATO. The NATO deterrent is assuming an ever-increasing importance in light of the unprecedented Soviet buildup of Soviet forces on NATO's southern flank and central front. Meeting this Soviet challenge, however, is a NATO whose southern flank has been severely crippled by the arms embargo against Turkey. The damage has been twofold:

First, the embargo has crippled Turkey's military capabilities. Spare parts are lacking for weapons systems that are often of immediate post-World War II vintage. Supreme Allied Commander Haig has estimated that Turkish military effectiveness has decreased by 50 percent since the imposition of the embargo in 1975. Turkey, therefore, will be increasingly unable to perform the NATO tasks assigned it.

Second, also, the embargo has provoked Turkey's growing alienation from the United States. Despite the pull to the East of its geography and Muslim religion, Turkey has formed an attachment to the values and ideas of the West. Yet there are powerful forces within Turkey which see the embargo as an indication of rejection by the West and urge a renewed Turkish identification with the nonalined world.

A congressional refusal to lift the embargo will perhaps not cause Turkey immediately to withdraw from NATO. After all, Prime Minister Ecevit has stated that he has no intention of detaching Turkey from NATO. But it will surely give great impetus to those forces that argue for a neutral Turkish posture and may make their objective irresistible.

NATO'S INTERESTS

A Turkish drift away from NATO to a neutralist stance or worse would pose a grave threat to the collective security of the United States and Europe.

Turkey is strategically important to NATO. Its landmass provides the vital air defense warning upon which U.S.

ships in the eastern Mediterranean depend while it bottlenecks Soviet war vessels moving from the Black Sea into the Mediterranean. Located on Turkish soil are a large number of well-placed NATO facilities which serve critical combat, communications, navigation, and support functions for NATO forces. In addition, Turkish ground forces are the second largest in NATO and tie down 26 Warsaw Pact divisions that might otherwise be shifted to the central front.

GREECE'S INTERESTS

Turkey is particularly important to the defense of Greece. Turkey's participation in NATO increases Soviet force requirements for a Soviet-Bulgarian attack upon Greece. Soviet air and sea invasion routes to Greece are within easy reach of NATO forces based in Turkey or, like the Dardanelles, are under Turkish control. A Turkish detachment from NATO would leave Greece surrounded by Communist or neutralist countries and would dangerously expose it to political and military forces not respectful of freedom.

Thus, it is very much in the long-term interests of Greece for Turkey to remain within the Western alliance system. To lift the embargo does not, therefore, represent a measure against Greece. Indeed, it is to the ultimate benefit of Greece for us to do so.

True, there are some within Greece who would prefer to see the embargo kept in place and Turkey further weakened and humiliated. The rivalry of Greece and Turkey in the eastern Mediterranean is old. But the United States should not take its counsel from those who seek to stimulate that rivalry. Rather, we should attempt to contain and reduce it much as we have within NATO these past 30 years. Greece and Turkey have cooperated within the European alliance and can do so again to bring peace and stability to the eastern Mediterranean. A Turkish alienation from NATO, provoked by the continuation of the embargo, would effectively reduce U.S. leverage with Turkey and our ability to help resolve tensions in the eastern Mediterranean through diplomacy. This would not be to the advantage of Greece.

To accept the argument that we must keep the embargo in place for fear of unleashing anti-Americanism in Greece would be an unfortunate acquiescence to blackmail. There is an undercurrent of anti-Americanism in Greece which, by and large, is connected to Greek perceptions of U.S. support for the nondemocratic Greek military rule in the late 1960's up until 1974. But the embargo of a 3½-year duration has not placated those elements in Greece which are anti-United States, anti-NATO, and anti-West in general. Indeed, our chances for improving our bilateral relations with Greece would have been far better had we devised an effective way, which the embargo patently is not, to promote a resolution of the Greek-Turkish differences on Cyprus and in the Aegean.

And we do not have the good fortune to have in Prime Minister Karamanlis an outstanding leader with whom we can work. The elections of the fall of 1977 gave his coalition government a comfortable parliamentary majority and the opportunity to remain in power until the next national elections in 1981.

CYPRIOT INTERESTS

It is thus apparent that the arms embargo is in the interests of neither NATO, Greece, or Turkey. And, after 3½ years, it should be equally obvious that the embargo is not in the interests of the people of Cyprus.

The embargo has impeded rather than promoted a settlement. It has stiffened resistance to accommodation by encouraging both sides, for their own reasons, to withhold necessary concessions. Proud Turkey will not yield to pressure while the Greek side sees certain advantages to maintaining the embargo.

To cling stubbornly to a policy that has been patently counterproductive offers no hope for the future of Cyprus or its people. It would also end the positive initiatives begun by the Turkish side since April 6, 1978, when President Carter asked Congress to lift the embargo. There is a message in the negotiating proposals, elaborative statements, and offers on Varosha the Turks have made since April. The message is:

We want to work with you. We want to reciprocate the move to end the embargo with positive measures of our own. No, you have not been able to force us to the negotiating table by beating us over the head with the embargo. But, you see, we still can and we want to cooperate with you very much.

We should build upon these initiatives by giving the Turks a chance. There are no guarantees that they will blossom immediately into a settlement. But we can be certain that, with a continuation of the embargo, there will be no settlement at all.

NEW SITUATION

We are, then, faced with a new situation. Adding to the opportunity of the moment is the fact that, for the first time since the fall of 1974 we have a single-party government in Turkey. Although Mr. Ecevit has a bare four seat majority in parliament, he is not hampered by the extreme nationalist coalition partners that made concessions from his predecessor, Mr. Demirel so difficult. We have in Greece a strong government and a strong leader in Prime Minister Caramanlis. He enjoys the largest single party majority in Western Europe and does not face reelection until 1981. Like Greece and Turkey, elections in Cyprus are now behind us. We, thus, have many of the ingredients needed for successful negotiation.

U.S. INTERESTS

Let us seize this opportunity and work toward a Cyprus settlement. Let us consider the interests of our friends and allies in NATO, including both Greece and Turkey. And of course, let us consider the United States and its needs and interests. Indeed, it is most often the interests of the United States that are overlooked in this debate.

It must be recalled that Turkey sent the largest single detachment of any foreign country to fight beside American troops in Korea. In 1957, to help the United States and in defiance of Soviet threats, Turkey concentrated its forces on the border of the newly pro-Soviet Syria. Turkey provided help that was critical to the U.S. effort to stabilize Lebanon and, during the 1962 Cuban missile crisis stood firmly with us despite Khruschev's threat that "nuclear war was on Turkey's doorstep." Moreover, during the October 1973 war against Israel, Turkey provided the intelligence regarding Soviet troop moves which resulted in the United States worldwide alert. These intelligence stations are now not operating because of the embargo.

Today Turkey could provide the warning that would be vital to the protection of our 6th Fleet operating off the shores of the Middle East. And Turkish geography alone blocks Soviet unimpeded access not only to the Middle East but to the Persian Gulf and Horn of Africa as well. It is Turkey's support with respect to these broad U.S. needs that proponents of the embargo are now ready to write off.

Out of consideration of the interests of the United States, of its allies in NATO, including both Greece and Turkey, and the people of Cyprus, I urge my colleagues to lift the embargo.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maine (Mr. EMERY).

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, I guess I am faced with the same problem as many other Members of this body are faced with this week. This is probably one of the most difficult and all-consuming foreign policy questions that we are going to be faced with in some time. We have a dilemma: On one hand we cannot overlook the rule of law. We cannot overlook a situation that involves American arms being used between two allies to disrupt the peaceful existence of people on the island of Cyprus. We cannot overlook the fact that American arms have been used to deny some people their civil rights. We cannot overlook the fact that the people of Cyprus have been denied their right to self-determination.

We cannot deny the fact that over the last several years there has not been sufficient movement with the embargo to encourage or to coerce or to force or to cajole these two sides to sit down and to work out a long-term arrangement that will allow both to escape with their pride and their national feelings intact and at the same time allow the Cypriots to run their own affairs.

On the other hand, we have a national security problem which is bigger than we have been able to face. It is a fact that without both Greece and Turkey in the NATO Alliance, we are weak. We are not necessarily able to maintain our commitments to ourselves or to our allies in that part of the world. It is in our domestic and international interests to see to it that both Greece and Turkey are strong and not only cooperate with NATO and the United States but also cooperate with each other because it is certainly true if we face a military confrontation in that part of the world neither Greece nor Turkey is going to be able to hold up their end of the NATO agreement alone.

It seems to me we have a responsibility in this body not only to try to dictate what is in the best interest of American policy but also to try to work out an arrangement whereby we may lift the embargo and allow our national security to be protected but at the same time to insure that both Greece and Turkey realize that if their NATO commitments are to be met they are going to have to sit down and work out a long-term arrangement from Cyprus.

I think there is some middle ground we in the House of Representatives can meet. That middle ground is somewhere between lifting the embargo without recognizing the obligations Turkey has or maintaining the embargo in the name of supporting our Greek allies in the name of maintaining our national security. Tomorrow I am going to offer a couple of amendments that I hope will allow us to find that middle ground.

One is to maintain the independence of Cyprus and to recognize the rights of the Greek and Turkish Cypriots to live in their own homes and maintain their own government and determine who their own leaders will be.

The second is to maintain a restriction against the use of American military equipment on Cyprus. I think we must express our displeasure on the use of any American military equipment in Cyprus against either of our allies. Also I will propose a period during which time the Turks, in order to show us their good faith, will announce their plans for the orderly withdrawal of Turkish forces from Cyprus.

I think without dictating to our allies, which we cannot do successfully, or forcing them through military action or through embargoes that have not worked, we can show our displeasure with some actions and our encouragement of other actions by including in this legislation some guidelines and some goals we would like to see both our allies meet on the Island of Cyprus.

I hope when my amendments are offered tomorrow we may debate them in greater detail. And, it may help some of us, with constituencies, that have supported the embargo to do the responsible thing on the part of our national security. At the same time it makes our feelings known to the Greeks and Turks that we will not overlook the abuse of civil rights of the Cypriot people but, at the same time, not rudely and unnecessarily destroy their pride or the unity of NATO.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I would like to congratulate the gentleman for the constructive ideas he has set forth here today. I wish to assure the gentleman, and I am sure he is aware of this, that his ideas are already under consideration in the drafting process of language that will, undoubtedly, be offered tomorrow. So the gentleman already has had a very constructive effect on the process.

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) very much. Of course, when I see the language that is offered I will support it if possible but, in any event, my amendments are awaiting in the wings if prior to tomorrow my objections have not been addressed.

Again I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this is, I think, the ninth time we had this debate. There is one dominating argument in the scheme of those who want to lift the embargo, and that is it has not worked, but, more importantly, we are tired of this debate. It is becoming somewhat tiring. But there are a couple of factual errors that have crept into the debate that must be corrected.

The dispute is not necessarily between two allies, Greece and Turkey, the dispute involves a separate independent sovereign nation, the Island of Cyprus a Cyprus member of the United Nations, was invaded on July 14, 1974, by an armada supported almost entirely, maybe 95 percent, by American equipment, using American naval vessels assigned to Turkey for NATO defense purposes, using American small arms and heavy arms assigned to Turkey for NATO defense purposes.

In the invasion of July 14 and the second invasion in August, 5,000 persons were killed on this independent nation island. The Turks occupied at that time, through their invading force, 40 percent of the island. To this day Turkey occupies every inch it occupied as of the day that the United Nations declared a ceasefire.

A number of the speakers who are supporting the removal of the embargo have said, A, it is counterproductive, and, B, it has not worked. Some of them said they have supported the embargo in the first instance because there was a violation of law, but that we cannot enforce the violation, and that while there has been no curing of the violations, the embargo still has not worked.

Those who believe that we should lift the embargo should know that they are only for their removal for all time of the limitation on the use of American arms. In every element of American jurisprudence, when a sentence is imposed because it is required to be imposed under the law, one does not rescind the sentence because they are tired of it, or because the sentence has not been successful in eradicating the condition under which it was imposed.

I was not in the Congress when the original restrictions on American arms were put into the law. Nor was I here when Turkey signed bilateral agreements incorporating the language which stipulated in precise and unequivocal terms that any nation, in light of the bilateral agreements, Turkey in particular, could not use that equipment for any purposes other than its own defense or a NATO-related purpose.

When the U.S. administration in 1974 failed to impose the embargo as specified, the Congress decided that there was no choice. The law had been clearly violated. We have had nine votes since then. Precisely the same considerations which justified imposition of the embargo in 1974 exist today. There is no factual dispute to discuss. The presence of the Turkish force, regardless of size, occupies the same identical territory it occupied in August 1974. Thus we are offered no choice, tired or not, weary or not, unhappy or not. The violation of law has yet to be cured.

The violation of law for which the embargo was imposed still exists, and we cannot be pragmatic about it. We cannot change and remove violations simply because the style or the substance or the tempo changes, or because we become tired of events. I would be delighted to see this embargo removed. I think it is absolutely essential that Turkey and Greece become viable partners in the southern flank of NATO, but we have no choice in the matter. We cannot relinquish the integrity of this institution or the supremacy of our law for the whim or caprice of foreign governments. We simply do not have a choice.

In September 1974, at Secretary Kissinger's request, we delayed the imposition of the embargo for 2 months. What was the Turkish Government's response? There was none. In December 1974 Congress delayed the embargo 2 more months at Secretary Kissinger's request. Again there was no response. In October 1975 we released the embargo in the hope that there would be inducement to Turkey to be cooperative, and to remove the violation by withdrawal from Cyprus, by giving them $185 million in arms, unlimited commercial sales, and there was again no response by Turkey. From 1974 to 1976 we had 9 meetings—those of us who believed in the imposition and maintenance of the embargo—with President Ford and Secretary Kissinger, and again there was no response. In April 1976 we authorized $125 million in foreign military sales to Turkey, and again no response. In May 1976 Congress added $125 million in foreign military sales to Turkey for fiscal year 1977—and what do you think happened? No response. In April 1977 Congress increased the foreign military sales, with my agreement—with my agreement—40 percent to $175 million, and again no response.

The hard, cold fact of life, as the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) has so articulately pointed out, is that there has not been an embargo. The embargo has not affected in any way a settlement on Cyprus. Between the imposition of the embargo and today, Turkey has received $600 million in U.S. military assistance. It is a charade to say that this embargo is hampering, hindering, or bothering Turkey in coming forth with a settlement on Cyprus. The embargo has absolutely nothing to do with it because there is no embargo. We are engaged in political rhetoric.

But there is one commanding obligation that we all have, and that is the maintenance of the rule of law. Like it or not, like the principles or not, like the parties or not, this is a country established and grounded and cemented in a rule of law. Because our executive branch has consistently undermined the rule of law by telling Turkey the embargo would be lifted, the embargo has been, in the words of those who want to lift it, counterproductive.

A rule of law is never counterproductive. We have only one obligation, whether we like it or not, and that is to sustain the rule of law by maintaining the embargo.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH).

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, in 1975, a total arms embargo was voted by the Congress after Turkey, in clear violation of American laws, had used American weapons for offensive purposes in its second invasion and occupation of Cyprus in August of 1974. Whereas Turkey's action of the previous month against Cyprus was mounted in response to a coup instigated by the Greek junta there, its second invasion took place at a time of relative peace. By August of 1974, the junta had fallen, a cease-fire was in effect, and peace negotiations were underway in Geneva. In response to this second, clearly offensive military operation, Congress, in accordance with U.S. arms export law, placed a complete embargo on Turkey.

Foreign policy considerations were urged by the executive branch later in 1975, as reasons the Congress should modify the arms embargo. The Congress responded by permitting the purchase, by military sales or credit, of arms by Turkey, "necessary to enable Turkey to fulfill her defense responsibilities as a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization" (NATO). However, these sales were contingent upon Turkey's observation of the cease-fire in Cyprus, not increasing its military and civilian presence on that island republic, and not transferring to Cyprus any U.S.-supplied arms. I voted for this modified embargo in the hopes it would lead to more peaceful process.

Now President Carter asks the Congress for a further change in U.S. foreign policy, to lift completely the present modified arms embargo on Turkey, contending that the embargo: First, adversely affects Turkey's military posture and NATO's capability, and second, lifting it should result in Turkish concessions in the Cyprus dispute.

Congress, in my judgment, has three issues before it: First, the embargo's effect on NATO's military posture in the eastern Mediterranean; second, its relationship to the prospects for a Cypriot settlement; third, this Nation's ability to control the use of U.S. arms sold overseas.

In the 3½ years since Congress first imposed and later modified its arms embargo, $425 million in arms have been sold to Turkey so that it may fulfill its obligations as a member of NATO. The President's request before the Congress for arms credits and sales to Turkey is identical—no more, no less—to the current fiscal year dollar figure of $175 million. Fifty million dollars in economic aid is added to a package that compares favorably to that allowed Greece. I understand that in no preembargo year has military aid to Turkey been as high. One may wonder if indeed an embargo is actually in place. Certainly, in view of the level of military aid, it is difficult to see that it is its existence that affects Turkey's military efficiency.

Greece is no less crucial to the security of NATO's southern flank than is Turkey; both are essential elements of the alliance. The administration is at best vague when addressing what effect lifting the embargo would have on the political stability of Greece. I submit that the impact could be severe. One may speculate that a nonalined Greece could isolate Turkey. Greek-Turkish relations are severely strained and the administration frankly admits it has no commitment from Turkey to attempt to improve relations. Any unilateral gesture on our part at a cost of unknown consequence to our alliance with Greece would be hollow indeed.

It is likewise difficult to understand how the embargo affects a Cypriot settlement. Totally lifting the embargo would be rewarding Turkish aggression in advance for initiatives not yet perceived. What would be the incentive for Turkey to make concessions toward a Cyprus solution if the final vestige of America's influence in bringing about a settlement is removed?

Finally, Turkey is still in violation of U.S. arms export laws. How would lifting the embargo affect U.S. control over arms shipped overseas? Would we not be giving a signal to other nations that we are not concerned over the use of U.S. arms? Clearly a foreseeable consequence is to encourage aggression by other recipients. Lifting the embargo may set a dangerous precedent, where this Nation could lose all control over arms manufactured here and sold abroad.

The present modified embargo language insisting that U.S. arms be used only for NATO purposes is consistent with law—U.S. law and the U.N. Charter.

The embargo conditions are similar to those imposed on Saudi Arabia with respect to their use and deployment of aircraft sold to them. What might we expect their reaction to be to a U.S. renunciation of the principles on which arms are supplied?

Mr. Chairman, I hold no personal animosity for Turkey, its people, or its Government. This is not an easy issue, affecting as it does the vital interests of the United States. I conclude that in the absence of any demonstrated steps by Turkey, or a commitment with respect to a resolution of tensions with Greece and a settlement on Cyprus, lifting the embargo at this time is premature. The United States would lose what leverage it has to promote negotiations, undermine the credibiilty of its laws, and invite a deterioration of its influence in the eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East. The status quo is preferable.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HAMILTON).

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of those provisions of H.R. 12514 which seek to ameliorate several U.S. interests in the eastern Mediterranean.

This bill seeks to address several important and interrelated interests of the United States throughout the eastern Mediterranean.

Provisions of H.R. 12514 seek to:

Repeal section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 which currently prohibits:

Delivery of previously ordered material to Turkey under the military assistance program or the grant MAP program; and

Military sales and financing for Turkey in excess of $175 million in fiscal year 1978 as well as continuation of sales and financing for Turkey after September 30, 1978, under the foreign military sales program. (The repeal of section 620(x) would be effective upon the bill's enactment.)

Authorize the appropriations of $35 million in grant military assistance authorization for Greece;

Authorize $140 million in FMS credits and financing for Greece and $175 million for Turkey:

Authorize the appropriation of $50 million to be used for a loan to Turkey under the Economic Support Fund, formerly called Security Supporting Assistance. This $50 million loan will serve to bolster Turkey's economic situation made difficult by a serious balance-of-payments deficit;

Make an important policy statement that a just and lasting settlement of the Cyprus dispute remains a central objective of U.S. foreign policy. A just and lasting settlement in Cyprus is described as permitting the establishment of a free and independent government on Cyprus which guarantees the human rights of the people of Cyprus;

Require the President to certify to the Congress in proposing security assistance programs for Greece or Turkey, that such assistance is intended for defensive or North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) purposes only, and in consistent with the objective of a peaceful settlement on Cyprus. Our intent is to assure all the parties involved that the U.S. Government will continue to use its influence to insure the continuation of a cease-fire on Cyprus until an equitable negotiated settlement is reached;

And finally require the President to report to the Congress every 60 days on the progress made during that period toward the conclusion of a negotiated settlement on Cyprus conflict. This is a continuation of the requirement now contained in section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961.

These several provisions support important American interests throughout the eastern Mediterranean. They seek to:

Improve United States-Greek and United States-Turkish relations and maintain the strength of their armed forces;

Enhance the southern flank of NATO;

Maintain our firm commitment to a Cyprus settlement;

Reinforce our political and humanitarian interest in a united and democratic Republic of Cyprus, free from foreign domination; and Give hope to all refugees that their legitimate grievances will be addressed.

For most of us, the present situation in the eastern Mediterranean is clearly unacceptable. In effect, what we have is an unraveling of the American position in the eastern Mediterranean.

Intercommunal Cyprus talks are deadlocked as both parties continue to politick in Washington rather than negotiate with one another;

NATO security has deteriorated;

The agony of many Cypriots persists and many Greek Cypriots who cannot return to their homes;

Our bilateral ties with Greece, Turkey and Cyprus are suffering.

So, everyone agrees the present situation is unacceptable.

The question becomes: how does the United States act to improve it?

The fundamental flaw in the argument of those who propose we maintain the embargo is that the status quo will remain—nothing will have changed; and U.S. interests in the eastern Mediterranean will continue to deteriorate.

The arms embargo against Turkey was legislated in 1974, went into effect in February 1975, and was partially lifted in October 1975.

It is time now to lift the embargo completely. Six strong arguments can be advanced for why we need to support the provision of H.R. 12514.

First, the embargo has failed to achieve its intended objective of promoting a settlement on Cyprus. Rather, it has stiffened resistence to accommodation by encouraging both the Greeks and the Turks, for their own reasons, to withhold necessary concessions.

The basic rationale for the embargo is that it would pressure the Turks into making concessions on Cyprus that would eventually yield a settlement and the withdrawal of Turkish troops. The proponents of the embargo apparently believe that the embargo will force the Turks to make significant unilateral concessions that will produce a settlement favorable to the Greek side. They rely on the embargo to achieve a solution.

They acknowledge that we have not had any progress on Cyprus, but they contend we should continue the same policy.

I conclude just the opposite: We have not made any progress under the present policy of the embargo. Therefore, we need to try a new approach.

Turkey, a proud and firmly independent nation, rejects the idea of yielding to pressure. The Turks find the embargo a painful humiliation.

Many Greeks want to keep the embargo in place because:

They fear Turkish military strength and possible action in the Aegean Sea region;

They believe its removal will weaken their bargaining position in Cyprus talks; and

They believe that any progress in negotiations will lead to the embargo's removal.

By lifting the embargo and espousing a policy of evenhandedness in negotiations, the United States can contribute to the creation of an environment in which constructive Cyprus talks can occur. Overt American pressure on one party will at best produce a temporary settlement and, at worst, produce no settlement. In this sense the embargo has reduced, rather than strengthened, our leverage.

The proponents of the embargo argue that Turkey will alter its policy under pressure of the embargo. But it is apparent that the embargo humiliates Turkey and that the Turks will not budge on Cyprus while the embargo is in effect.

Second, the embargo has jeopardized NATO security, the long-range defense interests of Greece, and American capabilities in the eastern Mediterranean.

These damaging consequences are magnified by the unprecedented buildup of Soviet forces on both the southern flank and the central front.

Turkey, with the second largest standing army in NATO, is of great importance to both the alliance and the United States.

With the understandable exception of Greece, all our NATO allies urge an end to this embargo.

Turkey's cooperation and full support in NATO is of great consequence for several reasons:

First. It is a vital link in the chain of nations forming the southern flank of NATO.

Second. It is a barrier to Soviet political, economic, military expansion in the Mediterranean, the Middle East, the Persian Gulf, and Africa. Denial or restrictions on the Turkish straits, land routes, or airspace would greatly complicate Soviet operations.

Third. It is a gateway for United States and NATO into areas of vital interest. Turkey's military facilities have major strategic value.

Fourth. U.S. intelligence facilities in Turkey provide warning and data on Soviet military activities of importance to NATO and the United States.

Fifth. Turkish forces tie down major Warsaw Pact forces. Well over 20 Soviet divisions are tied down by Turkish forces.

Four points should be emphasized:

First, the decline of Turkey's forces leaves the whole of southeastern Europe more vulnerable to Soviet penetration.

Five former Supreme Allied Commanders of NATO have expressed their fear that should Turkey turn away from this country as a result of the embargo and reduce or terminate its commitment to NATO, the whole of southeastern Europe and the Middle East would become more vulnerable to Soviet military pressure.

Turkey's ability to maintain defensive forces is diminishing. Conservative intelligence estimates indicate that Turkish forces today are 40 percent combat effective and that if the embargo continues, by 1980 the combat forces in Turkey will be only 20 percent effective. For the time being, it is doubtful that the Turks can fulfill their NATO mission.

Second, Greece's own position would be much more precarious without Turkey in NATO as a full partner.

General Haig has stated that so long as Turkey remains fully within the alliance, any Warsaw Pact attack on Greece would be a highly risky venture, while without Turkey's support the defense of Greece is vastly more difficult. That the Warsaw Pact forces maintain the capability to deploy more than 50 divisions against Turkey is clear evidence of Turkey's importance to NATO's southern flank. Turkey is, then, important to the defense of Greece. Without Turkey in NATO, Greek defense against Warsaw Pact would be severely undermined. Without Turkey, Greece stands exposed on all sides and the Warsaw Pact forces would face the simplified task of concentrating only on one front without fear of a flank exposed to Turkey.

Third, since the embargo went into effect our loss of intelligence on missile tests and troop movements in the Soviet Union has been significant.

The experts agree that these intelligence facilities are of great value, and that substitutes have been only partial. Estimates I have seen suggest that because of the embargo and closure of intelligence facilities, our information in certain key areas covered from Turkey has been degraded by about 50 percent.

Fourth, we should not lose sight of the fact that the strategically important Turkish land mass separates the Soviet Union from the Middle East and the Mediterranean. It controls exist from the Black Sea and entry into the Aegean.

The cooperation of both Greece and Turkey is needed to inhibit the Warsaw Pact and without the full commitment of Turkey to NATO, our national interest will suffer measurably.

Third, the embargo encourages Turkey to rethink both its basic foreign policy direction and its ties with NATO and the United States.

The consequences of the embargo are not only military. Turkey is the developing country with the longest continuous history of democracy in recent times. The Turkish revolution earlier in this century started a process of westernization that was consummated three decades ago when Turkey joined NATO. This history helps to explain Turkey's anguish over its treatment by the United States.

Turkey is today deeply disappointed in the United States, and we should be concerned about it.

The Turks drift toward neutralism should not be allowed to continue. The concern is not that Turkey would join the Warsaw Pact or become allied with the Soviet Union, but rather that its NATO orientation will erode and neutralism will become the cornerstone of its foreign policy. If Turkey did become neutral, then the Warsaw Pact could put great pressure on Greece and the eastern Mediterranean could become less stable, adversely affecting Israel and other U.S. friends in the region.

Fourth, the principle of the law has been upheld and Turkey has been punished for its misuse of American arms in Cyprus.

We have demonstrated to all countries that we are serious about enforcing the law, which provide for the termination of military aid in cases where U.S.-supplied equipment has been used for aggressive purposes rather than legitimate self-defense.

The focus of our concern should not be to punish Turkey, but to achieve an objective, to act in the U.S. national interest.

Is it not reasonable to think that an embargo that has crippled Turkish military capabilities for nearly 4 years is sufficient punishment for the misuse of American equipment? Is no allowance at all to be made for the circumstances surrounding the initial incident, including Turkey's perception of its treaty obligations to insure the independence of Cyprus and what it sees as its forbearance in the face of violations of the civil and human rights of the Turkish minority on Cyprus? Is the law not now being applied selectively?

Clearly, the time has come to question whether the rule of law is enhanced by unyielding and selective application.

There have been other violations of the law that have gone unpunished. A brief review by the Library of Congress indicates that there may have been as many as 26 violations since World War II by foreign governments, including perhaps Greece, of bilateral agreements with the United States, which defined prescribed uses of U.S.-supplied equipment. In only a few instances were arms shipments stopped and then only for a short period of time.

Turkey violated its bilateral agreements with the United States in August 1974 and it has paid a heavy price for what it did with U.S. arms. But punishment need not be of extended scope and prolonged duration to be useful. Beyond a certain point, it becomes self-defeating.

In these complicated disputes, the United States should avoid the pretense that moral or legal issues are black and white ones in which we can sit in judgment. Such pretense undercuts our representation for balanced concern about the role of law.

Fifth, negotiations for an overall settlement of the Cyprus situation are more likely after the embargo is lifted.

We all agree that the plight of Greek Cypriot refugees needs to be resolved and that the longstanding grievances of the Turkish Cypriot minority must be treated.

Turkish troops did commit violations of human rights in 1974 when it invaded Cyprus. Turkish and Greek Cypriots did in the 1950's and 1960's carry out violent acts against each other's communities. But as important as these issues are, they do not justify the continuation of the embargo if the embargo is an obstacle to negotiations. And it clearly is today.

Our objective today should be not to judge the past, but to give today's refugees hope for the future.

The problems of human and political rights that stem from decade of communal antagonism on Cyprus can better be addressed in the context of negotiation for an overall Cyprus settlement than in the present deadlocked situation. These human and political rights problems are not being adequately addressed today and can only be resolved in a settlement between the parties.

Lifting the embargo will facilitate the negotiation process. The United States can play a more useful role because we will be seen by the parties as even-handed in our approach. An embargo against one side makes it impossible to play that role.

Sixth, the Turkish Government and the Turkish Cypriots have recently shown a willingness to negotiate a Cyprus settlement.

While initial Turkish proposals are neither all the Greek side wants nor all it should expect, they should not be viewed with indifference. There is a new political situation in Turkey today, and Prime Minister Ecevit has latitude in Cyprus that his predecessor did not have.

Turkey has withdraw more than 17,000 troops over the months, and the Turkish Cypriots have displayed a willingness to:

Make significant territorial adjustments in six specific areas,

Reduce troop levels further,

Allow tens of thousands of Greek Cypriots to return to new Famagusta as negotiations begin,

And reopen the Nicosia Airport.

Furthermore, a detailed constitutional recommendation is on the table for discussion.

These initial proposals are promising and constructive. They offer a basis for renewed talks.

Tentative manifestations of Turkish flexibility and compromise will be dissipated if the embargo is kept in place. New and evolving Turkish positions can be drawn out and developed only through negotiations. Prime Ministers Ecevit and Karamanlis are meeting and the Cypriot leaders should do likewise.

As we move to lift the embargo, there must be no misunderstanding about the U.S. attitude toward Greece. It is an important ally and valued friend. Good relations with Greece are not predicated on bad relations with Turkey. Lifting the embargo against Turkey does not mean that the United States will or should provide a cornucopia of arms to Turkey. We do not seek to upset the military balance in the area, and we want both Greece and Turkey fully engaged in NATO.

Lifting the embargo may cause short-term strains in our relationship with Greece, but putting behind us the complications of the embargo, which now serves as a wedge between us, will in the long run promote reconciliation between Greece and Turkey.

The Greek commitment to democracy is deep, and their attachment to Western values and institutions that we share with them is proud. Our relationship will endure this strain, and will grow and prosper.

Mr. Chairman, there can be no guarantee that lifting the embargo will either resolve problems in our relations with these NATO allies or help achieve progress toward a Cyprus settlement. But there is certainty that the present unacceptable situation will be perpetuated and a Cyprus settlement further postponed if the embargo remains.

The reasonable hope is that lifting the embargo would trigger progress in the area.

It is important to note that we will not be voting on the 4-year Defense Cooperation Agreement with Turkey which was signed in January 1976. That agreement has been shelved by both Turkey and the United States. This means that we are in the position of being able to evaluate the situation from year to year and we will have leverage on the situation.

The parties are clearly unwilling to negotiate until the embargo issue is settled. The constant argument about the embargo has weakened our ties with all states and has adversely affected the domestic situation in Greece. Its removal can start the essential healing process in the region and can provide a basis for negotiations.

After 3 years of deepening risk to our national interests, it is time to try to break the impasse we face in the eastern Mediterranean.

Few foreign policy issues are as crucial today as this situation. We must adopt an approach more likely to produce a settlement on Cyprus. We need a policy that is more attuned to American concerns in the eastern Mediterranean.

Let us see who favors lifting embargo:

All members of NATO (except Greece);

All NATO Supreme Allied Commanders;

All our military leaders;

Ford and Carter administrations; and

All nine members of the European community.

The options before us are three:

One. We can tighten the embargo—no one is really arguing for that.

Two. We can continue as it is—that is what the proponents want, but it has not worked—for whatever reason.

Three. We can repeal it, start again, put new elements into this complex equation, create new circumstances, and the United States, with renewed vigor, can work with all the parties to reach a settlement of outstanding differences.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. LAGOMARSINO).

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to join me in voting to lift the arms embargo against Turkey.

Debate over the Turkish arms embargo tends to focus on two issues: First, Turkish violations of human rights on Cyprus, and the punitive measures U.S. law requires that we take in response; and second, the effect of the arms embargo on NATO's ability to protect the security of its members, and to hinder the projection of Soviet power. Opponents of lifting the embargo tend to concentrate on the former issue and to remain silent regarding the latter. This is because, of course, their best case is the human rights issue. But as we shall see, the actual facts of the case are far more ambiguous than many would have us believe. The opponents of lifting the embargo generally avoid discussions of the effect of the embargo upon NATO, largely because the facts are self-evident, and speak for lifting the embargo. But before I detail the case for lifting the embargo, I will examine the arguments against doing so.

The strongest case made by the advocates of the embargo concerns alleged Turkish violations of human rights in Cyprus. Upon examination, this case is not as strong as many claim, and can only be made by ignoring substantial evidence which does not support a preconceived conclusion.

The Turkish invasion of Cyprus in 1974 is cited as the violation of human rights. But here the inquiry stops. Seldom do the embargo's supporters examine the events that led up to the invasion.

Were they to do so, they would find claims of brutal persecution of the Turkish minority of Cyprus by the Greek Cypriots.

These efforts culminated in a coup in 1974 by Greek Cypriots determined to achieve union with Greece. The ominous implications of these events for the fate of the Turkish Cypriots was not lost upon the Turkish Government, which intervened to protect the embattled minority. In so acting, the Turks claimed they were exercising their rights under the provisions of the Treaty of London of 1960, which provided for unilateral action by either Greece, Turkey, or Great Britain, in the event that the Cyprus settlement was threatened with collapse. The Turks asked Great Britain to intervene, it failed to do so. The Turks claim the invasion then, was the consequence of Greek violations of the human rights of the Turkish Cypriots.

The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 requires that U.S. arms are sold on the condition that they be used only for defensive purposes. So, it is argued that the Turks utilized U.S. arms in an illegal fashion in the invasion of Cyprus. However, U.S. weapons supplied by the then Greek Government were illegally employed by the Greek Cypriots in their ill-fated attempt to take over the island.

So, an examination of the human rights and legal issues reveals contrary to what the supporters of the embargo say, there is justice and injustice on both sides of the issue. It seems to me, that the reasonable course of action to take in a dispute between two allies over a matter not affecting your vital interests, is to take a stance of neutrality or even-handedness. Obviously, an embargo, against one side or the other is a departure from neutrality. At least after it has been in effect 4 years and has not worked.

Turning to the case for lifting the arms embargo, the vital strategic role played by Turkey in the security of NATO's southern flank is undeniable. As General Haig, Commander of NATO, pointed out in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee on June 28 of this year, Turkey commands the Bosporus and the Dardanelles, "strategic chokepoints on the Soviet route to the Mediterranean and Indian Oceans." Furthermore, General Haig argued that Turkey serves as a buffer between the Soviet Union and the Middle East and Africa, thereby providing an impediment to the Soviet projection of power and influence to those regions. Incidentally, our military, and retired military, are unanimous on this issue.

In addition to these geopolitical considerations, U.S. listening posts in Turkey, closed in retaliation to our arms embargo, provided us with invaluable intelligence information, which cannot be gathered from alternative information sources. For example, it was from listening posts in Turkey that we learned during the October 1973 Middle East war that Soviet nuclear warheads were in route to Egypt, and that Soviet paratroop divisions were being assembled for movement to the Middle East. Having the advantage of this early warning, we were able to head off Soviet armed intervention in the Middle East by going to a worldwide alert. In addition, our Turkish listening posts gave us our best intelligence on the development of Soviet strategic missile systems. But now those posts are silent.

Failure to lift the arms embargo against Turkey would deal a profound blow to NATO's southern flank and the result would be a corresponding ascendancy of Soviet influence in the Middle East and Africa. It would be a sorrowful tragedy if U.S. lawmakers inadvertently brought such a grim state of affairs to pass.

Finally, let us not forget the people of Cyprus, in whose behalf we acted in the first place. It is unfortunate that the embargo has prevented rather than facilitated a settlement of the Cyprus problem. The Turks resist compromise because their pride will not allow them to suffer the humiliation of a settlement dictated by the United States. And the Greek Cypriots perhaps do not negotiate as seriously as they should but rather wait for the pressures of the U.S. embargo to wring concessions from the Turks. However, Turks have made substantial proposals and have withdrawn troops.

Mr. Chairman, Supreme Court Justice Robert Jackson had occasion during a dissent to remind his colleagues that overly narrow interpretations of the Constitution which ignore the fundamental realities of the day threatened to convert the Constitution into a suicide pact. In the spirit of Justice Jackson, I say "let us not convert provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 into a suicide pact."

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN).

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I thank the genleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) for yielding to me.

Let me state at the outset that my participation in this debate is not to try to persuade any of my colleagues to vote for or against lifting the present Turkish arms embargo. My purpose is simply to inform the Members of the House and President Carter that I cannot support the proposal to lift the aforesaid embargo in its present form.

Moreover, I believe after much correspondence and many private discussions with my colleagues here in the House of Representatives that there are several Members in much the position as I am on this question—we would like to see the embargo lifted but we want some concrete, specific details from the Turkish Government on ending the occupation of Cyprus as a prior condition to lifting the embargo.

Whether or not the House will follow the other body and support the pending proposal to lift the Turkish arms embargo is a question which will be answered this week. Should the House not follow suit with the other body and refuse to support the President's proposal, I believe support could be generated among Members like myself who would like to see the embargo lifted if prior to its lifting we have some specific details on the Turkish timetable for withdrawing its more than 25,000 troops on Cyprus.

In reviewing many of the events which have taken place since the imposition of the Turkish arms embargo nearly 4 years ago, I have come to the conclusion that not enough good faith negotiations on the part of the Turkish Government have occurred to warrant a lifting of the embargo. As a new Member of Congress who has never faced this issue before, I have taken a great deal of time to study this matter before making my decision. Until recently I was uncommitted on this issue, waiting to see for myself how both sides in this dispute justified their methods of approach.

I have been invited to the White House where the President along with the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and others discussed with me and several of my colleagues their reasons for wanting to lift the embargo. Their arguments were very persuasive considering the impact that this dispute could have on the continued well-being of the NATO alliance. I have taken this point under advisement as well as the fact that both of these countries—Greece and Turkey—are old and reliable international allies and trading partners of the United States.

But the problem boils down to this: Turkey, although removing several of its forces off Cyprus, has not discussed and seems unwilling to discuss any specific timetable for the departure of the rest of their forces. I doubt that Greece will ever negotiate with Turkey if their (Turkish) forces remain on the island in such large numbers. If such a timetable for withdrawal was effected, the burden for negotiating in good faith would then fall upon the Greeks. Further, the Cyprus question is a very real problem of considerable consequence to the United States and the free world and thus we should begin taking action which brings these two contestants to the negotiating table, not moving in a direction which hardens the age-old lines between them.

It seems to me that, for once, we should conduct our foreign policy with our own national interest foremost, then take action following responsive action by other countries—not act first in deference to "the other guy," as in the case of the Panama Canal giveaway "because unless we give in, the canal will be blown to bits," or "unless we lift the arms embargo, Turkey might move toward the Soviets in its international alliances." I am tired of this increasingly weak trend in our foreign policy and the resulting aggressive, mischievous, tangible actions by our adversaries around the world.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a partisan issue and this is not a pro-Greek, anti-Turk issue. It is a matter which transcends politics. Unless there is a cessation of hostile activities on the island of Cyprus and a withdrawal of Turkish troops within a specified time period, the entire NATO alliance along our southern flank could be permanently weakened. Therefore, I will continue to oppose any lifting of the embargo until there are some good faith negotiations; let us for once conduct our foreign policy on the basis of the performance, not just the promises, of other countries in the world community of nations.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maryland (Ms. MIKULSKI).

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of continuing the Turkish arms embargo. It is my belief that the United States cannot maintain a double standard on human rights for friend and foe.

In recent weeks, many Members of Congress joined in the world denunciation of Soviet human rights violations. I applaud the Carter administration's support for Scharansky and other Soviet dissidents. However, the administration seems to be overlooking the human rights violations of our friends, the Turks. To ignore severe and brutal human rights violations of such friends as this is, at best, expedient, and, at the very least, hypocritical.

The administration vetoed the sale of a new computer to the Soviet Union's news agency to express our disapproval of their treatment of Scharansky and Ginsburg. Such action has brought quick results, as evidenced by the parole of a recently convicted dissident. At the same time, however, the Carter administration has asked Congress to lift the embargo on arms sales to Turkey.

Why should we technically sanction one nation which violates human rights and then turn around and open up arms sales to another? If the United States expects to be effective as a voice for human rights, we must be morally consistent.

There has been a systematic accounting of the brutal human rights violations committed by the Turkish forces in Cyprus. Although the State Department has attempted to stifle the factual account of the massive human rights violations by Turkey, a recently released report by the Council of Europe presents a sad picture of abuses by the American-equipped Turkish forces on Cyprus.

The European Commission on Human Rights of the Council on Europe found Turkey guilty of violating six articles of the European Convention on Human Rights.

Turkish troops on Cyprus have systematically killed innocent civilians on a substantial scale. Turkish occupation forces have been found guilty of raping women of all ages, and particularly teenage girls. Remember—these Turkish troops are using American weapons as tools of repression.

The Human Rights Commission also found that prisoners and those detained for questioning have suffered inhumane tortures. There has been extensive looting and robbing of Greek Cypriot homes and businesses. With the force of American arms, the Turkish troops refuse to allow the return of refugees to their homes.

Many of these atrocities are being perpetrated by Turkish troops using American arms. These violations of human rights would have the indirect blessing of Congress if we lift the arms embargo before the Turkish forces leave the sovereign soil of the Republic of Cyprus.

Congress should not lift the embargo while Turkey flaunts the Convention on Human Rights and systematically does violence to innocent victims on Cyprus. American weapons must not be used as tools of repression anywhere in the world.

One part of this bill prohibits arms assistance to countries who engage in persistent violations of human rights. The Turks are violating human rights on Cyprus.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, to lift the embargo would be illogical, inconsistent, and inhumane.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I support the retaining of the embargo.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SIKES).

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of lifting the embargo.

Mr. Chairman, it is time for realism in dealing with the arms embargo placed upon Turkey by Congress 4 years ago. The embargo was imposed because of an explosive situation on the Island of Cyprus between the Turks and the Greeks. The Greeks have been our warm friends for many years. Most of us in Congress have Greek-American constituents who are good citizens and active friends. This situation has outweighed efforts to achieve calm reason in our attitude toward the conflict. What is now clear is that the effectiveness of the NATO alliance is more and more threatened. That means the peace of the world is threatened because the embargo is steadily pushing the Turks toward a new alliance which could prove to be dangerous for NATO, dangerous for Greece itself, and dangerous for the United States because of our intimate associations with the nations of the Mediterranean.

Turkey is important to the United States for a number of reasons. First, and most obvious, is Turkey's strategic position with regard to the Soviet Union. Turkey's geographic location is a key element in discouraging Warsaw Pact and Soviet aspirations toward the Mediterranean and Middle East. Major land, sea, and air routes to these areas lead across Turkey.

We and the NATO alliance have enjoyed the use of highly important military bases in Turkey. These bases include some of the most important information-gathering sites available to us anywhere in the world. As a result of the embargo, we and NATO no longer have the advantage of operations in Turkey and we have lost invaluable intelligence on Soviet space, military activity, and strategic nuclear activities.

Another reason that makes Turkey important is its standing army of 480,000, NATO's second largest. This large army, which protects the eastern edge of NATO's southern flank, costs us nothing and ties down approximately 26 Warsaw Pact divisions. Without having to face this formidable line of defense, these Warsaw Pact forces could be transferred to other areas along NATO's lines of defense which would require significant money and manpower to offset.

Without Turkey, the southern flank of NATO is left exposed and virtually indefensible. Turkey has depended principally on the United States for arms for years. They have not been available since the embargo was imposed. That means obsolescence is creeping in. Spare parts, essential to any military operation, are not available. Existing stocks have been cannibalized to continue operability of the remaining weapons. The Turks are realistic. They must have arms for their own defense. They want to stand with the United States and with NATO. If we continue to rebuff them, their predictable course is crystal clear. Russia is a readily available source of weapons. Turkey is being seriously courted by the Soviets. They are offering military and economic aid.

The Turkish Government which took office in January of this year under Prime Minister Ecevit has indicated a willingness to be more flexible with regard to the Cyprus situation. The Turkish Government has, with the United States playing a key role, agreed to certain principles under which a new government in Cyprus might be organized and Turkish troop withdrawals accomplished. These new positions represent an advance over stands the Turks and Turkish-Cypriots have taken in previous negotiations. A lifting of the embargo would be an important sign of our support for these new initiatives toward peace. Lifting the embargo can insure a continuation of these talks and of the hope for a peaceful settlement.

If we fail to remove the embargo it should be clear that the Turks will become more adamant over Cyprus. Nothing will have been accomplished by years of waiting. Greece itself, our good friend for so many years, will become the nation with the most to lose. Let us not forget that in the late 1940's the Communists made a determined and nearly successful bid to seize the Greek nation. Active American military and economic support stalled the Soviet effort. If Russia can establish a working arrangement with Turkey with a naval passage through the Dardanelles and overland communication to the oil rich Middle East, you can be certain that Greece will be caught in a new pincers movement which will far overshadow the seriousness of the present Cyprus negotiations.

We must lift the Turkish embargo to show our desire for the friendship and support of an important ally as well as our desire to take the only step that can lead to a peaceable solution of the Cyprus problem.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HILLIS).

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that if this Congress is to act in the best interest of the United States the Turkey arms embargo must be removed. This is a complex issue and certainly an emotional one to many Americans. Nevertheless, it would be a mistake to view the removal of the embargo as an anti-Greek vote. Indeed, lifting the embargo is also in the national security interest of Greece. The defense of Greece, a valued ally and friend of the United States, would be much more difficult if Turkey were not also a valued ally.

I am sure that we all understand the strategic importance of Turkey. The contiguity of Turkey with the Soviet Union, the Mediterranean, the Middle East, Western Europe, and the Balkans speaks for itself. Turkey's importance to NATO, and the United States in particular, mandates that its military be capable to meet any threat. Due largely to the embargo, Turkey's military readiness is extremely low. This situation has been the subject of much concern throughout NATO.

If NATO is to be strong, Turkey must be strong. Not only is Turkey's location important, but it supplies more NATO troops than any other country.

While Turkey's military capabilities are cause for concern and cause enough to support lifting the embargo, it is the Cyprus situation that is the focal point of attention. Until just recently the situation was stagnant. The embargo has failed to resolve the Cyprus issue and will continue to only act as a roadblock to any future settlement.

The United States imposed the embargo to illustrate our displeasure with Turkey for breaking bilateral agreements in using U.S. weapons in Cyprus. We have made our point. We now need to look forward and determine what actions are necessary to facilitate a settlement on Cyprus.

By lifting the embargo under the terms requested by the administration, or the terms agreed to by the Senate last week, the United States, and in particular the Congress, can review Turkey's efforts to resolve the Cyprus situation. Should Turkey fail to make any substantial overtures in resolving the Cyprus issue, we will have the opportunity to reevaluate our policies with respect to our military assistance.

In the meantime Turkey would be well aware that unless the Cyprus issue was resolved to our satisfaction they would once again face reduction in military assistance.

For his part, the President has decided to stop the multi year $1 billion defense cooperation agreement with Turkey and negotiate new agreements. Further security assistance from the United States will be decided on a yearly basis.

Should the embargo not be lifted today, we lose the leverage to force Turkey to negotiate a Cyprus settlement. Further, by not lifting the embargo we continue to hurt ourselves as well.

With the embargo Turkey suspended our activities at five major installations used to gather intelligence information on the Soviet Union. The loss of these facilities has made it more difficult to obtain current information on Soviet military and space activities.

Unless we lift the embargo Turkey's feelings of isolation will continue to grow. Turkey views U.S. security assistance as evidence of our intent to continue as a stable and dependable ally.

The embargo has served mainly to damage United States-Turkey relations. Whatever point we wished to make by imposing the embargo was made long ago. The embargo has now become counter-productive. We must use the lifting of the embargo as an incentive to the Turks to resolve the Cyprus situation. Our commitment toward settling the Cyprus issue and our security interest demand lifting the embargo.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentlewoman from Maryland took note of atrocities and human rights violations on Cyprus at the hands of Turkish soldiers. The record actually is replete on both the Greek and Turkish sides with atrocities and human rights violations. I think it ought to be noted that the violations that occurred in 1974 were the acts of individual men, moved by hate and fear, and were not the policies of any government, including the government of Turkey.

Mr. FINDLEY. I would like to refer my colleagues to my insertion in the RECORD of July 25, p. 22664 which documents Turkey's current record on human rights. It shows that Turkey is not engaged in substantial violations of human rights either on Cyprus or in Turkey.

Refugees—both Turkish- and Greek-Cypriots—resulted from the 1974 Turkish intervention. The stalemate that has existed on Cyprus because of the embargo has not benefited them. Their well-being will be best assured within the context of a final settlement which will be best stimulated by our lifting the embargo on both.

Several other points:

First. Much is made of a European Commission of Human Rights report on Turkish violations in 1977. I would call to the attention of my colleagues the fact that the Council of Europe has declined to endorse or issue this report. The Council of Europe has noted the violations committed by both sides in 1974. And Turkey has filed charges of the violations of Turkish-Cypriots during the years 1963–74.

Second. Turkey cooperates fully with Amnesty International.

The basic question we should ask ourselves is: Will the repeal of the embargo improve or worsen the well-being of the Greek- and Turkish-Cypriots?

Mr. Chairman, I believe it will improve the well-being of both by stimulating a settlement.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. BEARD).

Mr. BEARD of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, in 1975 I came to the Congress and I heard the arguments many times that we have heard about the mechanics of what is going to be in the best interests of the United States, what is going to be in the best interests of Cyprus, what is going to be in the best interests of Turkey; but I think we must address the question, does might make right? I say in this case, no.

I think that is what has happened here today. I am surprised. I am just shocked to hear so many state that, because of the power that Turkey possesses, the fact that Turkey is in a position to help us monitor the Russians, but we are completely ignoring one of the most important issues of this debate, the people of Cyprus. Cyprus is not Greece, Cyprus is a sovereign state. In Cyprus, the people right now live in tent camps.

In 1975, I presented my credentials as a Member of this House to the Turkish Government at the checkpoint and was refused at gunpoint. That was their expression. That was their response.

The United States is to be a showpiece of democracy, a showpiece according to this administration for human rights. I think the human rights of these Cypriot people are being completely ignored, because it is desirable to have a good military relationship with our other ally, Turkey.

I do not think we should trade democracy and human rights for the sake of lifting the arms embargo to have friendly relationships with a country that has pointed guns at Cyprus and is using gun barrel diplomacy. I think it is wrong and I think we are going to make a mistake here if we demonstrate to the world that we will completely back down for a country, because we need them for military power or military strategy.

I think the human rights issue should supersede any other issue here. The people of Cyprus are struggling. They will have little or no chance unless we hold by the principle that might does not make right. That is really what is happening here.

We are representatives of the people, as a Congress. Just because the administration says they want to lift the embargo, I heard that before, I heard that with Mr. Kissinger. Mr. Kissinger said it is absolutely necessary to have these strategic points in Turkey. We got along without them, so those arguments do not go. They hold no water.

I say we must think about those people on Cyprus, our other ally, even though they are a small country, even though they cannot defend themselves. Has this country forgotten its promise to help those that cannot help themselves?

I am telling you, the only way we should consider this vote, and I would be the first to vote to lift the embargo, is if Turkey sat down and really, truly, negotiated and started total withdrawal from the country of Cyprus.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the provision contained in the bill before us, H.R. 12514, to end the arms embargo against Turkey.

This embargo, as we recall, was imposed after Turkey violated U.S. laws by using American-supplied weapons for offensive purposes in its August 1974, invasion and occupation of Cyprus. Unfortunately, the Cyprus crisis remains unresolved and the adverse consequences of its continuation increase daily.

In a good-faith effort to help resolve the problem, I joined with a majority of the Congress, in October 1975, in passing legislation to partially lift the embargo against Turkey. It was our hope then that such action would encourage Turkey to reach a settlement. This has not happened, despite military sales to Turkey in the approximate sum of $425 million during the past 3 years.

Now, we are being asked to fully repeal the embargo despite the lack of any substantial progress toward a settlement on Cyprus. We are being asked to repeal the embargo despite the fact that Turkey remains in violation of several of our laws and agreements arising out of its invasion and occupation of Cyprus. We are asked to repeal the embargo despite the fact that it has never actually been given a chance to work. I remain convinced that the effective use of the embargo represents the best leverage for settling the Cyprus question and restoring the full rights to the more than 200,000 refugees now living there.

By opposing this effort to lift the embargo, I am not seeking to punish or to discriminate against Turkey and in no way am I questioning Turkey's strategic importance or association with NATO. What I am seeking, however, is that Turkey live up to the responsibilities required of all good allies and partners in NATO and in the defense of the free world. By removing this embargo, we will be removing the major incentive for Turkey to respond.

Accordingly I urge my colleagues in the interest of seeking a resolution of the Cyprus problem to reconsider the action taken by the Committee on International Relations and vote to retain the arms embargo against Turkey.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK).

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I hope very much that we will raise this embargo.

We have heard excellent speeches on both sides today from sober and responsible people wrestling with a very difficult problem. I do not think it is useful to accuse Members of personal bias or hypocrisy. I think we are far beyond that here.

We have an embargo that is, according to those who would keep it, a sham, but they are unwilling to let go of it. We have here a status quo that is agony, according to those who would keep the status quo. We have here a system under which we have operated now under two administrations of two different parties which has led to 20 violations.

We know that we do not impose an embargo on all countries, because 20 times our arms have been used in ways that are contrary to the prescription, and we have done nothing.

Why are we now suddenly descending on the Turks? I have no particular brief for Turkey. Greece is the country I love best. I have been there 18 times, and I have never been to Turkey. I have studied Greek philosophy and Greek plays. We are all heirs of the Greeks.

But that does not mean that we can let our hearts and our whole inclination rule us when we are trying to deal with the welfare of our country and the peace of the world.

As we look around the Mediterranean. what is happening? We see new troubles in Portugal. Spain is not yet fully settled after a long and difficult dictatorship. We see Italy with grave political problems. We see Yugoslavia ruled by an 86-year-old President. Then there is Greece and Turkey. Lebanon is on fire.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) has expired.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK).

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman. That will allow me to continue my tour of the Mediterranean.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) so she can do the complete circle.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield for a question?

Mrs. FENWICK. Yes, of course.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, is the gentlewoman aware that there have been a dozen—and I may be off by one or two in my figures—United Nations resolutions by direct vote of the Security Council in the General Assembly directing Turkey to remove itself from Cyprus?

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I think those resolutions have been brought to our attention this afternoon. Nobody is denying the situation. The question is: How is it going to be improved?

What we have been doing is a sham, according to those who wish to keep the embargo, and it is also useless. Let us just consider what we really should be trying to do. I say to the Members, those of us who have particular attachments to one country or the other—and I have confessed my own—that we are trying to deal with the safety and security of our country and with the peace of the world. The Mediterranean cannot be just left to go off by itself without our allies in full cooperation with us.

To continue the tour of the Mediterranean, we come to Egypt, with its economic problems. Then we look at Lebanon and Israel, which is only stable, but under great pressure. Then we have Algeria and Lybia, which are certainly not commanded by two of the most stable statesmen in the world.

Then we see Tunisia, with a fine President now very old. Then we come to Morocco and the Atlantic ocean, and we have made the whole tour of a desperately difficult part of the world—a part of the world which may get us all involved in some hideous conflagration.

Why do the Members suppose two administrations of different parties have been opposing the embargo? Not because they have any fancy ideas, but because they are concerned about the security of our country and the defense of the whole Mediterranean.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

The previous administrations, the Nixon and Ford administrations, for 7 years supported the military junta in Greece, over my objections, over the objections of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL), and over the objections of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, if I may take back my time, we are not talking about 7 years. We are talking about the efforts to lift the embargo, and we are talking about the embargo. We are not talking about the previous 7 years.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I am talking about administration policy.

Mrs. FENWICK. I thank the gentleman for his comment, but there is no use of bringing in more than we are talking about. This issue is not easy for anybody. That is all I am trying to say. We must not impugn each other's motives.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, much has been properly made today of the rule of law, and there could hardly be a more appropriate place for that expression to be made than in this Chamber. That is what our society is all about. And yet I think all of us believe that punishment should fit the crime, and we should all recognize that Turkey has been punished very severely for whatever infraction of the law was undertaken in its placement of troops on Cyprus. But we ought to keep in mind several other things, and one of them is that we have been very selective about our application of this particular law. We have seen fit to punish just one nation, and yet there is a long list of nations which, in 26 instances, according to a Library of Congress study, have misused U.S.-supplied arms.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. ROSENTHAL) is on the Committee on International Relations. He is privy to classified documents which give the chapter and verse of violations of recent date. And yet only one nation, namely, Turkey, has been singled out for punishment.

So we have been selective in our application of the rule of law. We have neither applied the rule of law nor considered justice.

The other thing I think we ought to keep in mind is that Turkey believed it was acting in compliance with international law when it moved on Cyprus in 1974. The Prime Minister was Mr. Ecevit. In fact, he made a trip to London to consult with the Government of Great Britain, a 1960 treaty guarantor power on Cyprus according to Turkey's treaty violations.

We ought to keep in mind that Ecevit thought he was acting in compliance with international law when he moved troops on the shores of Cyprus.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield whatever time I have remaining to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, 7 years ago I testified before the House Foreign Affairs Committee in strong opposition to the policy of the administration in supplying U.S. arms to the military dictatorship in Greece. The reason I did so is because I thought that that policy was profoundly hostile to the interests of the West, hostile to NATO, and hostile to the national interest of the United States. But the Department of State at that time, the administration at that time, argued, "Oh, we have to give arms to the Greek military dictators although they torture and put their political enemies in jail, because, of course, we need them for NATO."

I think that the folly of that policy followed by the then administration has been clear for all to see. But the same kind of argument is being used by the present administration today. For, Mr. Chairman, there seems to be very little disagreement, certainly on the part of the executive branch, no disagreement, that the Government of Turkey violated its bilateral agreements with the United States and provisions of American law in invading and occupying 4 years ago next month, the month of August, some 40 percent of the Island of Cyprus, an independent, sovereign republic, throwing some 200,000 Cypriot citizens into refuge status.

In spite of all of these facts, Mr. Chairman, the administration today still insists that it is important that we continue to supply arms to the Government of Turkey because of the importance of NATO.

However, NATO is not what this argument is all about, Mr. Chairman. This argument is about a fundamental principle of American law, a fundamental principle of American foreign policy, namely, that arms supplied to other countries by the United States are not to be used for aggressive purposes.

Despite the representations that have been made by some speakers here today, we have not used the argument that maintaining the embargo will produce a settlement and that this is the reason Congress imposed the embargo. We imposed the embargo because the executive branch of the Government of the United States refused, and willfully refused, to enforce the laws of the land.

Mr. Chairman, I would remind my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr FINDLEY), that it is just not accurate for him to have said or to have suggested or to have implied that the Government of Great Britain gave approval to the Government of Turkey to invade the Island of Cyprus.

The fact of the matter is that there were two invasions of Cyprus by Turkish forces, one in July, to which no objection was entered by Congress; and another in August 1974, when Turkish forces invaded and occupied 40 percent of Cyprus at a time when peace talks, which included the British, were being held in Geneva.

In the light of these facts, Mr. Chairman, it is extraordinary that the administration has engaged in a massive lobbying effort not to persude the Government of Turkey to redresss the wrong which almost everyone acknowledges that it committed on the Island of Cyprus in August of 1974; but, rather, to persuade the Congress of the United States to abandon our law, to abandon principle.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, that we have really not been responsive here in Congress to the impasse which has taken place on the island of Cyprus. However, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. ROSENTHAL) has already pointed out, Congress has made effort after effort, after effort to induce the Government of Turkey to respond with concrete actions on Cyprus.

Mr. Chairman, I cite two instances: Congress agreed to a 40-percent increase in the level of foreign military sales to Turkey from fiscal year 1977 to 1978. Yet the Government of Turkey did not move 1 inch on the Island. And then the President of the United States, Mr. Carter, made a complete reversal of his policy during the 1976 campaign, namely, that of linking a resumption of a full arms relationship with Turkey to a just settlement on Cyprus.

What was the response of the Government of Turkey to this change of policy? Nothing. The Government of Turkey did not move 1 inch. Yet, if the administration spent as much time and energy, Mr. Chairman, in trying to get Turkey to take some concrete action on Cyprus as it has in trying to win a victory over Congress and trying to persuade us to abandon our historical principles and the law of our land, we would have had a settlement of this problem a long time ago.

Mr. Chairman, there is one other point I would like to make. Again and again I have heard it argued that we have tried the embargo and it has not worked. However, that is just not true. Officials of this administration, even at a time when the President of the United States was maintaining fidelity to his campaign promise that he would link a resumption of full arms sales to Turkey to a just settlement on Cyprus, in instance after instance, undermined the effectiveness of the embargo. Out of the sides of their mouths, as it were, these administration officials, by their actions, said to the Government of Turkey, "Don't worry about the embargo. We do not really take it seriously."

Why do I say that? The U.S. Ambassador to Ankara, who has been roaming the halls of Capitol Hill, some months ago, early this year, went on Radio Ankara and did an interview in which he attacked the policy of the President of the United States, at least the policy as it was then. The American Ambassador to Turkey attacked the Congress of the United States for having written the embargo into law, and said that he hoped that a way could be found to circumvent the law.

That interview was a direct signal to the government of Turkey not to take seriously either the then policy of the President or the law passed by the Congress of the United States.

Again, the administration, despite its statements in support of the rule of law, allowed the use of a little-known NATO agency located in Luxembourg called NAMSA as a funnel through which to launder money, to circumvent the statute passed by Congress in order to get money for arms to Turkey. The administration, as the gentlewoman from Maryland has made clear, despite its reiterated pronouncements on the importance of human rights as a new dimension in American foreign policy, is turning a blind eye—a blind eye—to the continuing massive, ongoing violations on the island of Cyprus where 200,000 people—200,000 people—are refugees from their homes. To give the Members an idea, Mr. Chairman, if there were that proportion of refugees in our country, that would be 75 million Americans driven from their homes, still not able to return to their homes.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we will remain faithful to our principles, faithful to the rule of law and that we will maintain the embargo.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished majority whip.

Mr. BRADEMAS. I thank my colleague and friend from Illinois.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADEMAS. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of continuing the embargo on weapons to Turkey. Our national policy as legislated by Congress some years ago is that we not send weapons to countries for any other reason than self-defense or collective security. This is no time to retreat from the sound policy of not providing weapons to our friends to kill each other.

Mr. BRADEMAS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, in the spirit of bipartisanship I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California (Mr. JOHN L. BURTON).

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. I would like to associate myself with the remarks of our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

The proponents of lifting this embargo keep citing General Haig. I mean, who is General Haig? He was nobody until Henry Kissinger, the architect of this corrupt policy of not having the embargo, plucked him from someplace, and he ended up being the head of NATO after he was Nixon's last chief of staff. So, I think he has got a vested interest in what the program used to be and what brought about the embargo. I think we should take his words accordingly.

Second, it was stated that Turkey—and I do not know this to be a fact, but certainly some people believe that they have seen chickens with lips—but Turkey is one of the oldest democracies in the developing world. The developing world, I thought, was made up of colonies, and to call Turkey either a long democracy or to call it part of the developing world when it was really the center of the Ottoman Empire kind of defies description.

The embargo is very simple, and we would not have to go through this charade, because the President can certify to Congress that Turkey is observing the American laws. We are a society of laws and not men, although sometimes people forget that.

He can certify that there is substantial progress toward a settlement in Cyprus, and that is all it takes. What we are saying to those who want to lift the embargo is that they do not care whether or not the laws of this land are observed, and they do not care if there is substantial progress toward a settlement on Cyprus, because if these two conditions were met, the embargo would automatically be lifted, because the President could make a certification.

That is really what it is about. It is very simple.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is absolutely correct. I just want to read this, so that we can be absolutely accurate. It says:

All military assistance, all sales of defense articles and services (whether for cash or by credit, guaranty, or any other means), and all licenses with respect to the transportation of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war (including technical data relating thereto) to the Government of Turkey, shall be suspended on the data of enactment of this subsection unless and until the President determines and certifies to the Congress that the Government of Turkey is in compliance with the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the Foreign Military Sales Act, 497 and any agreement entered into under such Acts, and that substantial progress toward agreement has been made regarding military forces in Cyprus:

If the President felt that Turkey was in compliance with the law and that they had in good faith made progress toward withdrawing forces, he could then lift this embargo. Why does he not do it?

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. I do not know. I would say to those who are worried about the fact that somehow Turkey is going to leave NATO, I do not know anybody who has reason to be more concerned about the Soviets than Turkey. Certainly, Turkey is not going to join the Warsaw Pact.

That Turkey may go neutral, God forbid that anybody in the world becomes a neutral. But, the most important thing is that all they have to do is observe the law of this Congress and this country, and the conditions upon which they get their arms, and have significant progress toward settling the Cyprus situation. I think they ought to do that, and I think the embargo should be maintained until they do that.

If we cannot do that, let us just repeal all of our laws, because it just does not make any sense to have somebody obey the law if somebody else says it is a bad idea that one should obey a law of the United States.

I thank my friend, the gentleman from the great State of Illinois, for yielding.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. BRADEMAS), recalled the days of the Papadopoulos regime in Greece when he and I both opposed military assistance to that regime, but his point really proves the point I was trying to make earlier: How selective we are in applying our rule of law.

Here Greece was in the firm control of a dictatorship and the party of the gentleman from Illinois was in control of Congress. Yet good reason did not prevail and we did not shut down military assistance to that regime. I regret it. I am sure the gentleman does.

The gentleman from Indiana in a recent newsletter, his newsletter No. 4, relates to congressional action and Turkish actions in negotiations on Cyprus. And the column on Turkish action lists nothing but no response. But curiously, the timetable ends with April 1977, which of course means he did not need to list the detailed proposals on Cyprus tabled April 13 which U.N. Secretary General Waldheim termed "substantial and concrete," and the further elaboration of these proposals made by the Turks and Turkish Cypriots on May 22, and the Turkish offer of July 20 to turn an interim administration was proposed for Varosha over to the United Nations and permit 35,000 Greek Cypriots to return to Varosha. Also, more than 2,000 troops have been withdrawn since April. Curiously the information in the newsletter was silent on these very important steps taken. Yet, now the Greek Cypriots have responded to the Turkish proposals, have made a counter offer. If agreement on Varosha can be reached and it looks as though it will be, we will have real momentum developing toward a Cyprus settlement.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I yield the balance of my time to my friend, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, the reason I did not list those various instances the gentleman cites is that the highest officials of the executive branch, and I do not want to embarrass them by citing their names in public, have told me that these so-called Turkish proposals cannot be taken seriously.

Mr. FINDLEY. But why is the gentleman requiring ironclad promises from the Turkish side?

Mr. BRADEMAS. Will the gentleman let me respond?

Even the highest officials of the executive branch of the United States regard those instances as cosmetic, as transparent, as disappointing.

As I said earlier, we are not asking promises from the Turkish side but concrete actions on Cyprus.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1½ minutes at this time.

First, I want to say to my friend, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY), that I consider him to be one of the great agricultural experts in the House of Representatives.

Now, to get back to foreign policy, the facts are as the gentleman from Indiana mentioned, that the withdrawal of 2,500 Turkish troops is merely a gesture. It is not a significant adjustment. The reason is that the Greek Cypriot forces are not capable of any offensive military action. The Turks could withdraw 10,000 and it would not endanger their military control.

Second, Verusha is a small piece of real estate.

Famagusta is the major port and major city and also a great resort center and that would be a major concession if the Turks withdrew.

Last, but not least, I would like to point out to the Members, that in 1967 the junta took over in Greece, because of possible control of the government by Mr. Andreas Papandreou. That gentleman is still in Greece today as a leader of the minority party. If there is a sudden adjustment in U.S. policy, it could very well precipitate a political situation such as that which existed in Greece in 1967. Greece as an historic ally deserves better understanding from the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Illinois yield me the balance of his time?

The CHAIRMAN. Would the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) yield his remaining 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), if the gentleman promises not to misuse it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) for 2 minutes.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, at the outset let me sincerely and deeply thank my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) for yielding me this time.

In closing the debate, Mr. Chairman, I would specifically like to address myself to those of our colleagues who have voted for the embargo and who now are considering changing their vote.

The decision to change is never easy. But rarely has change been so urgently required as it is today on the question of lifting the Turkish arms embargo. It is needed not only in the interests of U.S. and NATO security needs, but also in order to facilitate genuine movement toward a solution on Cyprus.

The House must decide today whether it wants to cast yet another vote on retaining the embargo or whether it is instead prepared, in the light of fact and logic, to embark on a more hopeful, commonsense, and promising course.

Our debate today is of overriding importance and great historical consequence. Let us then begin this debate by ridding ourselves of the false choices which have paralyzed decision for so long.

These false choices are: First, that we must either vote for the rule of law or else abandon a foreign policy based on principle; second, that we must vote either for Turkey or against Greece, and third, that we must vote either to retain leverage over a Cyprus settlement or else throw such leverage irretrievably away.

Once we have rid ourselves of these erroneous assumptions and come to understand the facts, it will be easier for us to set our policy on a saner course; it will also be easier to see the real risks which we would incur by remaining on our present one.

SECURITY VERSUS RULE OF THE LAW

Let us first examine the argument that by lifting the embargo on Turkey we would be putting security interests in front of U.S. legal principles and moral aims. This argument disserves the truth.

To begin with, the rule of law has been upheld. Punishments derive their validity from the fact that they have been applied—not that they are everlasting. This sanction has been in effect for nearly 4 years. By the evidence of all responsible observers, it has crippled Turkey's military capability. For example, Turkish air and armor are reportedly at only 50 percent operability, forcing units to resort to existing equipment for most of their spare parts and replacements. Overall, the general readiness of Turkey has declined even below the point formally permitted by NATO rules.

To argue in the light of this that the rule of law was undermined because some aid reached Turkey indirectly by means of a common NATO supply, is to suggest that in addition to a fine and jail, the prisoner must also be starved.

Obviously, U.S. security interests figure in this decision in a most important way. But proponents of retaining the embargo say you must choose between these interests and higher principles. In doing so they imply that our strategic objectives are devoid of all moral content and therefore less worthy of respect. In point of fact, U.S. and NATO security interests serve the broadest moral requirement of all: namely, to preserve the liberty and independence from which the rule of law itself flows.

GREECE VERSUS TURKEY

Let us take a look at false choice No. 2: That lifting the embargo is a vote for Turkey and against Greece. This, too, is simply wrong. The fact is that a vote to lift the embargo is really a vote to assure that the best long-term interests of Greece are fully protected. The problem is that these interests are not always immediately discernible, obscured as they are by an emotionalism as intense as it is understandable.

Whether or not it is willing to admit it, Greece needs Turkey, just as the United States needs the friendship of both. Greece needs Turkey as an active partner in NATO and as a committed member of the West. Without Turkey, Greece would be completely isolated by Communist States and members of the Warsaw Pact. It would be cut adrift in a lonely and vulnerable corner of the Mediterranean and susceptible to serious pressures. Without Turkish help a credible Western defense of Greece would be almost impossible since Soviet troops and supplies would be able to move swiftly across the Black Sea.

Moreover, Greece stands to profit, not lose, from the restoration of sound United States-Turkish ties. Even proponents of the embargo concede that U.S. influence has been crucial several times before in preventing armed hostilities on Cyprus—at time of wrongs against the Turkish Cypriot population. The United States failed in this regard only once, when warnings were too feeble and too late and when our diplomatic attention was diverted elsewhere. The point, of course, is that when U.S. ties with Turkey are firm, the prospects for stability are increased, and from this Greece is best served.

Finally, if Turkey were to drift away from the West and to take its bearings increasingly from the neutralist or even radical camps, Greek-Turkish bilateral difference would become more acute. Does it make sense, is it in U.S. interests to let this alienation become ever more likely, by retaining the embargo?

RETAINING LEVERAGE OR THROWING IT AWAY

This brings us to the third and final false choice: That we can either lift the embargo and lose our leverage over a Cyprus settlement, or retain the embargo so as to prod Turkey toward settlement.

This, too, is simply wrong. We have little leverage now, and will surely have less for each month the embargo remains in effect. The political dynamics in Turkey would promptly vote out any government that succumbed to the embargo.

Nor can we expect negotiating flexibility from those Greek Cypriots who mistakenly see the embargo as the key to unilateral Turkish concessions. The result is a vicious circle, a stalemate, and a progressive poisoning of the processes of peace.

Now it happens that Turkey has very real and natural incentives of its own for wanting to reach a settlement on Cyprus. The high cost of stationing troops on the island is an added burden to Turkey's pressing economic problems. But these domestic incentives for peace are buried for the moment under layers of bitterness brought about by our well-intentioned but decidedly out-lived punishment of the Turkish Government.

It is time to realize that the purpose of the embargo has been served. It is time to realize that its extension would only result in greater antagonism, a lessening of NATO capability, and a further erosion of the U.S. position in the eastern Mediterranean.

It has been said of course that the President has changed his position on this issue, as if that alone were an argument against lifting the embargo. Years ago, Winston Churchill addressed similar criticism by saying:

> The only way a man can remain consistent amid changing circumstances is to change with them while preserving the same dominating purpose.

The dominating purpose today is as it was 4 years ago. To promote peace and stability among our friends on NATO's southern frontier, and to secure the best interests of the United States.

If men like President Jimmy Carter, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, and special adviser to the President on this issue, Clark Clifford, have come to change their point of view, one ought to wonder why. The answer comes back like a shot:

Because the times have changed.

Because the threat to NATO's security has increased.

And because the embargo has choked off the natural incentives for settlement on the island of Cyprus.

We too must face this same set of facts as we cast and justify our vote today. In their light the false choices of political rhetoric and the understandable urgings of the past must inevitably pale.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I am disturbed by the impact of section 19 in this bill—dealing with the transfer of U.S. military equipment to the Republic of Korea—and intend to offer an amendment to this section at the proper time. My amendment has been included today in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Let me explain the background of this issue and the rationale for my amendment to my colleagues, so as to solicit their support for it.

Shortly after he took office in January 1977, President Carter ordered the withdrawal of all U.S. ground forces from South Korea over a 5-year period. He made that decision in spite of the fact that the Joint Chiefs of Staff strongly disagreed; and that virtually all U.S. officials in Korea, military and diplomatic (including General Singlaub), believed that withdrawing the U.S. Second Division would definitely increase the risk of war in Asia.

The Investigations Subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee, of which I am chairman and which visited Korea and its Asian neighbors last January, concluded:

> All of the testimony presented to the subcommittee agrees that the presence of U.S. forces in Korea, particularly U.S. ground forces, has been the single most important factor in preventing the outbreak of a new war in Korea . . . (The) deterrent capability of these U.S. ground forces . . . is not based exclusively on (their) combat capability. It also involves a very significant psychological deterrent.

Earlier this year Senator GLENN and the late Senator Hubert Humphrey issued a Senate Foreign Relations Committee report which expressed similar concern over the withdrawal decision, and urged going very slowly and carefully.

Yet Congress has still taken no formal action to assert its right to a say in the making of this most important decision—one that could conceivably lead to a new war in Asia.

Section 19 of the foreign aid authorization bill, which is up today and tomorrow, represents an effort to get congressional approval now for the withdrawal of all 32,000 U.S. ground troops through 1983, and without any provision for phased congressional review and decision.

I believe it would be a serious dereliction of duty for the House automatically to grant the President a blank check on this whole withdrawal, without insisting on further periodic congressional review and restraint.

Last week the Senate added an amendment to its own version of the same bill, offered by Senator PERCY and NUNN, that "It is the sense of Congress that further withdrawal of U.S. ground forces from the Republic of Korea may seriously risk upsetting the military balance in that region and requires full advance consultation with the Congress. Prior to any further withdrawal the President should report to the Congress on the effect of any proposed withdrawal plan on preserving deterrence in Korea * * *" and on a detailed list of other important strategic questions.

I share the Senate's concern. But if it is to mean anything more than words Congress cannot grant authority for the complete pullout on this same bill.

Section 19 of the present bill would authorize the President to transfer to the Republic of Korea all $800 million worth of the combat equipment of the U.S. Second Infantry Division and its associated support units between now and December 31, 1982, as these 32,000 troops are withdrawn over a 5-year period. If section 19 becomes law as it stands, Congress will have lost all meaningful say in the matter of further withdrawals. The Percy-Nunn amendment would become a nullity.

So I will seek to amend section 19 by reducing the equipment transfer authority from $800 to $90 million—which is enough to cover the equipment associated with the first 6,000 troops originally scheduled for withdrawal by President Carter.

Before the President could get further transfer authority, however, he would have to present to Congress all the extensive military assessments called for in the Percy-Nunn amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is a most important amendment. It does not interfere with the President's authority. It simply recognizes that Congress must have a legitimate, coordinate share in any action that might involve one of Congress most important responsibilities—the warmaking power.

I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. FUQUA, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 12514) to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act to authorize international security assistance programs for fiscal year 1979, and for other purposes had come to no resolution thereon.

PERMISSION TO FILE CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 10929, DEFENSE DEPARTMENT PROCUREMENT AUTHORIZATION, 1979

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the managers may have until midnight tonight, Monday, July 31, 1978, to file a conference report on the bill (H.R. 10929) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons and for research, development, test and evaluation for the Armed Forces, to prescribe the authorized personnel strength for each active duty component and the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces and for civilian personnel of the Department of Defense, to authorize the military training student loads, to authorize appropriations for civil defense, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to announce that we are going to take up the bill H.R. 12931, foreign assistance appropriations for 1979. We expect to finish debate on that legislation. We will rise when we have finished the general debate, or at 7 p.m.

FOREIGN AID APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12931) making appropriations for foreign assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to not to exceed 2 hours, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG) and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Texas (Mr. KAZEN) as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House and requests the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) to assume the Chair temporarily.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 12931, with Mr. FOLEY (Chairman pro tempore) in the Chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) will be recognized for 1 hour and the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG) will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG).

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I submit for your consideration today the foreign assistance and related programs appropriation bill for fiscal year 1979.

Congressman BILL YOUNG of Florida, the capable and hard-working ranking member, has spent many hours asking probing questions and conducting outside research and study. DAVID OBEY, CHARLES WILSON, SIDNEY YATES, YVONNE BURKE, MATT MCHUGH, ED ROYBAL, LOUIS STOKES, SILVIO CONTE and VIRGINIA SMITH have all made valuable contributions to this year's bill. In the main, we agreed more often than not.

Let me make it clear that I support foreign aid if properly administered and that my chief desire is first to reform foreign aid to bring it closer to doing what it has always claimed to do—help the really poor people; and second, to put the bill in a form that will enable it to pass the House.

The foreign assistance appropriation bill is an omnibus bill. The committee recommends a total appropriation of $7 billion, 353 million, an increased of $614 million above fiscal year 1978. The largest part of the increase being attributed to the international financial institutions. The committee recommendation provides for a $702 million increase for the IFI's over the fiscal year 1978 appropriation level. Because increases of this size will hardly be acceptable to the House, I shall offer an amendment, cosponsored by Representative CLARENCE MILLER of Ohio, to reduce the proposed funding for the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB), and the International Development Association (IDA), to a figure which represents an increase closer to that in the rest of the foreign aid program and closer to the percentage increases in domestic programs, such as social security, defense, public works, veterans, and community development. If this amendment to reduce IDB and IDA by $584 million is accepted, I believe we shall have a foreign aid appropriation bill that the House can support and I urge the House to pass this bill after these reductions are made. Needless to say, I shall support the bill, whether or not the Long-Miller amendment passes.

Mr. Chairman, I support foreign aid that is directed to the really poor people in poor countries, and not to rich people in poor countries, for some of the richest people in the world are found in poor countries. I see no justification in taking money from poor people in rich countries and giving it to rich people in poor countries, with the idea of letting the poor scramble for the scraps that may fall off the banquet table. Because of Congress redirection of our bilateral aid program and because of the Agency for International Development's (AID) willingness to refashion its programs away from a heavy capital approach and toward light capital technology, I have supported increases in funding for AID's development assistance accounts of 25 percent over fiscal year 1978 appropriation levels. Our main objective is to redirect foreign aid, to make it do what it has always claimed to do—help the poor to a better life and help them moreover to help themselves. Some success toward this end is being achieved by our bilateral aid program under the able direction of John Gilligan, who has displayed a willingness to cooperate with this committee in making foreign aid do a better job than it has in the past. If the House supports our efforts to reduce funding to the multilateral banks until they recase their aid programs and become more accountable to the U.S. Congress, we could have a better chance of success of making them do in fact what they have claimed to have been doing.

A selective reduction such as the Long-Miller amendment proposes is better than a meat-axe reduction which hurt good programs such as agriculture, rural development, nutrition, population control, health, education, schools and hospitals abroad, disaster assistance, refugee relief, Peace Corps, support for Israel, Africa, and Greece. If the Long-Miller amendment to reduce the international banks is accepted, Mr. Miller will not offer an amendment to apply an across-the-board reduction.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman have an explanation as to whether or not someone else might offer that amendment, if the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MILLER) did not?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. I have talked to a lot of people on the minority side and I have found nobody that intends to offer the amendment but if anybody does we would have to deal with it at that time.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. Has the gentleman talked to the gentleman from Maryland, for instance, who might offer the amendment?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I have no reason to go into this matter at this time. I would like to finish my statement.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, important subjects are addressed in the report. Funds are being channeled into areas of light capital technology with the aim of more directly helping the poor and encouraging more self-development, at less cost to the U.S. taxpayer. Improving the quality of life of the 1 to 2 billion poor in the developing world is far beyond the resources of the United States even when aided by other developed nations.

Helping the vast majority of the world's poor must be primarily an undertaking of self-help, in which we can show the way, hopefully in the right direction.

The committee recommends $3.8 billion for activities carried under title I of this bill which includes the basic economic and military assistance programs.

The United States has a vital stake in a Middle East peace and the committee recommends the continued funding of the various Middle East programs which amount to about $2.3 billion of the total bill. This represents no increase in funding for the Middle East programs over fiscal year 1978.

Under title II, the committee recommends an appropriation of $648 million for military credit sales. The committee also addressed the desirability of the administration reducing the amount of U.S. arms sold around the world and we hope international negotiations will be undertaken by the major arms suppliers to discuss a coordinated effort for reducing worldwide arms sales.

The committee markup recommended $2,628 million for the six international financial institutions requesting funding in fiscal year 1979. This recommendation is $702 million above the previous fiscal year appropriation. The Long-Miller amendment would reduce funding of IDB and IDA to a combined level that would still be the highest in the history of the banks and which will still represent a bigger percentage increase, plus 14 percent, than the President's budget allowed for major domestic programs, such as social security, plus 13 percent, energy, plus 12 percent, national defense, plus 9 percent, veterans, 0, public works, minus 11 percent, and community and regional development, minus 11 percent.

The committee recommends the full limitations on the use of corporate funds for the Export-Import Bank of $5.4 billion.

The committee also expressed its concern over human rights. This year the committee is recommending that reductions be made in the military assistance, but that no countries be named in the bill and that instead an illustrative list accompanied by a general statement be included in the report—page 9. So many countries have perceived human rights violations, and the situation is capable of changing so fast, that the committee felt that this approach would be prudent and reasonable.

The committee recommends that the bill retain the prohibitions against direct aid to Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, Uganda, Mozambique, Angola, and Cuba, both for human rights reasons and because Congress has expressed its disapproval of these dictatorships, both left wing and right wing.

Last is the issue dealing with commodities which our foreign aid is subsidizing overseas in competition with U.S. products. The Members may want to read sections 508 to 509 on pages 22 and 23 of the bill. Language in section 508 would prohibit direct foreign aid, as well as the Export-Import Bank, and the Overseas Private Investment Corp. from assisting in the establishment or expansion of production of any commodity for export which is in surplus on the world markets and which would cause substantial injury to U.S. producers of the same or similar commodity. Section 509 directs the Secretary of the Treasury to instruct the U.S. Executive Directors of the various IFI's to use the voice and vote of the United States to oppose any assistance by these institutions for the production of any commodity for export which is in surplus on the world market and which would cause substantial injury to U.S. producers of the same or similar commodity.

Mr. Chairman, I especially support foreign aid that is directed at really poor people in poor countries. Because of Congress redirection of our bilateral aid program, I have supported increases in funding for the Agency for International Development's (AID) development assistance accounts of 25 percent over fiscal year 1978 appropriation levels—from $931 million in fiscal year 1978 to $1,160 million in fiscal year 1979. AID has shown a willingness to fashion away from a heavy capital, trickle-down approach and toward a light capital technology, bottom-up approach that will enable the poor people to improve their own lives by marshaling their own sweat capital and their own money capital and with a minimum of outside help.

Foreign aid must be redirected. Aid-giving countries, especially the United States, suffer an acute shortage of capital. The developing countries, to help any considerable proportion of their poor, must stretch their own capital and their aid from us over as many people as possible. The greatest resource of poor nations is the underutilized labor time of their people, what I call sweat capital. In addition, there are in poor nations scattered money savings that are not now available for development because the poor peasants do not feel they can deposit their savings in confidence and not lose their money through embezzlement, mishandling, or inflation. To continue with past development strategies that emphasize large amounts of capital per worker would mean that only a small percentage of the world's poor would be helped, with the great majority of the poor getting nothing.

What I am trying to accomplish is the redirection of foreign aid, away from heavy capital, prestige projects that benefit the rich and well-to-do, toward light capital, self-help projects that reach the really poor people. To achieve this redirection, I have done the following:

Strongly supported from the beginning the Appropriate Technology, International (ATI), a private organization set up by Congress to help poor countries develop their own light capital technologies.

Initiated with AID a program, now being designed, to reach two-thirds of all small and poor farmers in Honduras over the next 5 years with light capital technologies. This program will be studied by a large number of Latin American nations to see what works and what does not work.

Persuaded AID to undertake a feasibility study to examine the possibility for a worldwide information system on light capital technologies so that experts in the field can have a choice of the best light capital solution to particular problems.

Prompted AID to develop low-cost methods of delivering new methods to illiterate small farmers. One possibility that AID is exploring is the use of instructional pamphlets consisting wholly of pictures.

Had enacted into law an amendment requiring the United States to place "important emphasis" on light capital technologies in preparing for and participating in the U.N. Conference on Science and Technology for Development.

Had enacted into law two amendments requiring the United States to "promote the development and utilization of light capital technologies—as major facets" of the multilateral development banks' development strategies.

Had accepted by the House an amendment to the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Act requiring the President to utilize light capital technologies in implementing employment policies and programs of the act. U.S. emphasis on light capital technologies for domestic projects will help show developing countries that there is nothing "obsolete" or "second-class" about such technology.

Instrumental in obtaining funds in fiscal year 1978 and fiscal year 1979 for the Department of Energy's program in light capital energy technologies. Although primarily for domestic purposes, this program will be coordinated with U.S. efforts to help developing countries devise alternative energy technologies and will illustrate the need by the most advanced industrialized countries for light capital technologies.

Persuaded AID to shift personnel from Washington to the field, to cut living and operating expenses abroad, and to establish effective accounting procedures.

Through my legislation and funding recommendations, I hope to inspire U.S. leadership to reform the multilateral banks so that these institutions can increasingly help the poor in poor countries. Reforms that I am trying to bring about in the multilateral banks are the following:

The allocation of multilateral bank aid to light capital technology and self-help projects that will really help the poor.

Revision of career incentives for the banks' employees away from merely moving money toward designing and carrying out projects that help the really poor.

Reduction of extravagant salaries, travel practices, and fringe benefits.

Prohibition of aid to countries that are gross human rights violators.

Increased accountability to the U.S. Congress of the multilateral banks' activities and openness of the banks' activities to the public.

Elimination of aid to steel, textile, electronics, sugar, palm oil, citrus, and other industries which this foreign aid subsidy enables foreign producers to compete unfairly with U.S. producers in violation of free enterprise.

My main objective in reforming our foreign aid program is to make it do what it has always claimed to do and that is to help the poor help themselves. Some success toward this end has been achieved by our bilateral air program. I hope the House will support my efforts to reduce funding to the multilateral banks until they reform their aid practices.

Mr. Chairman, that completes my presentation.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, it hardly seems a year since we went through this great debate in fiscal year 1978, but it has been a long time and a lot of things have taken place since we began that debate last year.

I want to pay tribute to the chairman of our subcommittee, who has done a remarkable job, especially when one considers the tremendous complexities of this legislation, the fact that there are very few people in the United States who actively support this foreign aid program, and the fact that he presided over a subcommittee that had as many divergent views as it has members.

In addition to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG), I want to pay tribute to the Members on the majority side, along with the Members on the minority side, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE), who has been a real assistance to me—his many years of service on this committee have provided him much insight that he has been willing to pass on to me—and the gentlewoman from Nebraska (Mrs. SMITH), a newer member of the subcommittee but also one who has a tremendous interest in this whole question of foreign aid and how it fits into the economy of the United States and how it is received by the people of America. And, Mr. Chairman, we have an outstanding staff on this subcommittee. On the majority side, we have the professional committee staff, with Don Richbourg and Don Denton. On the minority side, we have Jim Fairchild and Jim Conrow. I do not know how Don and Don teamed up with Jim and Jim, but it works out well, and it is a good bipartisan team. There is no partisanship involved in this. They have done a good job for the subcommittee.

Mr. Chairman, as the debate goes on and as we go through the amendment process, I want to get it said for the record early that there are programs in our foreign aid accounts that I think are handled very well and that I think are needed and provide a service for the people they are intended to provide.

Programs, such as family planning, disaster relief programs, the Middle East package for Israel, and the American schools and hospitals abroad are some examples of what I consider to be good foreign aid type programs, and I do not think the general American public would be opposed to them if they fully understood them or if they had an opportunity to know just actually what they included.

It has been one of the big problems with foreign aid that too many people know too little about what is going on in the foreign aid program. I know that my interest was aroused last year when administration officials said that it was their plan to double our foreign aid program, and they said they were going to double it, primarily, through the international financial institutions, like the World Bank, IDA, the Asian Development Bank, and others. As a matter of fact, the U.S. Congress has no control over the way those American dollars are used. I was really concerned when the administration said they were going to double our foreign aid program mostly through the international financial institutions. And I was not the only one who was concerned. Many of my colleagues, those who oppose our foreign aid and those who support our foreign aid, spoke out and indicated that doubling our foreign aid program in a 5-year period was quite a big bite to chew. So the administration officials changed their language from "doubling" the foreign aid to "a substantial increase." At the same time they were talking about the substantial increase, they threw in some new language. They talked about a new international economic system. The things seemed to tie together, but it was hard to get any real answers as to just how they did tie in together. But the question of doubling through the international financial institutions was not so far off. The administration requests for fiscal year 1979 for the international banks was 82 percent larger than the amount appropriated by this Congress for fiscal year 1978. That is almost double that particular part of the program in only 1 year. Because of the action of the subcommittee, that 82-percent increase was reduced considerably, but as of today it is still a 36-percent increase over the amount of money appropriated for the IFI's last year, and a 36-percent increase just ain't bad when it comes to spending money.

When this all came about, I asked my colleagues, I asked the news media of this great Nation of ours, I asked the people of this country, the various organizations they belonged to, to engage in a national debate to talk about this foreign aid program, to try to get answers to their questions, to develop information as to what the foreign aid was all about.

Mr. Chairman, we got that national debate. There have been hundreds of newspaper columns, radio and TV comments, and editorials on the subject of foreign aid. I would like to say that they all supported the position that I hold, but they did not. Many of them did, many of them did not.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, if any of the Members have been reviewing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD lately, they will see many pages of newspaper editorial comments favorable to the foreign aid program, which have been listed. I would be happy to do the same thing and would provide copies to all of the Members as to the editorials and the comments which have been adverse to our foreign aid policy as it is today; but I do not have the advantage of the State Department's clipping service, and I cannot afford to pay for it myself. Therefore, I do not have copies of all of them. I just have copies of several hundred which were sent to me by interested Americans from many, many parts of this great land of ours.

Mr. Chairman, I will tell the Members one thing that this great debate has done for Members of Congress: We have had more attention from the White House, from the State Department, from the Treasury Department, and more information presented to us in "Dear Colleague" letters in the last few months on the subject of foreign aid than ever before. My colleagues have been to the White House for breakfast, for lunch, for buffet suppers, to hear the story of foreign aid.

In the next couple of days, we are going to hear a large story on foreign aid because this is the way I see our foreign aid program. My friends and colleagues, whether you agree with the position I take or not, understand this, that I have spent a lot of time asking questions, seeking out answers, developing opinion. Believe me, whether the Members agree or not, they should at least understand that I do not enter into this debate lightly and without some reason for taking the positions that I do.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, there is just too much ripoff in our foreign aid program. The $7.3 billion that are to be appropriated by this bill before us here this evening are full of programs which are full of ripoffs. The Members know what a ripoff is. That is where the money that has been appropriated for a specific purpose never accomplishes that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the House to an international policy report on the question of the foreign aid program in Bangladesh. It talks about a tubewell project. It goes into many specifics, and I am not going to bother the Members with most of them. I just want to report some of the conclusions.

The title of this one paragraph is, "Food Aid—Who gets it?"

The report says:

For nine months in 1975, the authors did research for a book in a village in northwestern Bangladesh. They learned that the supposed beneficiaries of foreign aid, the small farmers and the landless were the last to receive it. While commodity aid did not directly affect them, food and project aid did. Instead of reaching the poor, such aid benefited those who needed it least.

Mr. Chairman, is that what our foreign aid program is supposed to be all about? Our foreign aid program is supposed to help the poorest of the poor. Throughout this debate the Members are going to hear about some amendment that I might offer or which might be offered by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG), our chairman, or by some other Member, and we will hear arguments that we should not adopt that amendment because this program helps the poorest of the poor.

The problem is that while it is intended to help the poorest of the poor, unfortunately, seldom does that really happen.

Mr. Chairman, let me read another sentence from this same report. These are the same people who spent 9 months in Bangladesh. They say the following:

At first, we were surprised that the beneficiary of the World Bank's aid should be the richest man in our village.

Did the Members hear that? They said:

At first, we were surprised that the beneficiary of the World Banks' aid should be the richest man in our village, but on closer investigation, we learned that this was not so strange.

A foreign expert working on the project told us, "I no longer ask who is getting the well. I know what the answer will be, and I don't want to hear it. One hundred percent of these wells are going to the big boys."

So, when Members hear the talk about this great aid program helping the poorest of the poor, in theory that is great, but in practice that is just not the way it has happened. I have one more paragraph from this report:

The village potentates of northwestern Bangladesh were not the only beneficiaries of the project. Corrupt government officials took their share in the form of sundry bribes and kickbacks. The SIDA evaluation notes that the tubewells provided certain officials with "a source of additional income, as they could protract or expedite matters in the decision-making process relating to the allocation of their tubewells. Most actions or non-actions could (and can) be priced." But the man who appears to have benefited most from the tubewell project is neither a government official nor a village landlord. He is a private businessman named Jahural Islam, reputed to be Bangladesh's richest citizen.

After months of behind-the-scenes maneuverings, the details of which remain shrouded in secrecy, Dacca Fibers won the contract for supply of the pumpsets for the IDA tubewell project.

This is somewhat long and complicated, but bear with me because it is important that the Members know where our dollars are going and who is handling them. I quote further:

In the process, the price tag on the pumpsets jumped to $12 million, although another company had reportedly offered to provide them at the World Bank's original estimate of $9 million.

I cannot understand that. They could have had the tubewell pump sets for $9 million, but when some of the corrupt politicians got through, it jumped to $12 million. What did the World Bank do about this? Nothing. According to a report in the Far Eastern Economic Review, at this point the Dacca staff of the bank urged that the project be postponed. They could not understand the 33-percent increase in price all of a sudden either. They recommended that the project be postponed or canceled altogether, but they were overruled in Washington. In the words of one reporter:

Islam's extra $3 million was easier than robbing a bank.

Members are going to hear more about this tubewell project as we proceed, but I just wanted to take the time to let them hear about this particular ripoff, and the examples go on and on. I will have some amendments that will be aimed at some of these ripoffs. I hope Members will support them. They may or they may not, that is, of course, a decision Members ought to make, and I would never attempt to tell another Member of the House of Representatives how he should or should not vote. I see my role as one of bringing information to the Members upon which they can make their judgment.

Incidentally, while we are talking about this helping the poorest of the poor and this report talked about food, somewhere in the debate Members are going to hear that the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG) is strangely opposed to feeding hungry children in the world. I read that in some newspaper articles printed in my district, wondering why I was against feeding hungry kids throughout the world. My friends, that is not the case. I am not opposed to feeding hungry children. I do not want to see anybody in this Nation or in any other nation go hungry, but I do not want to see the corrupt politicians getting rich while those poor kids we think we are feeding are not getting any of the benefits.

On that subject, I think Members should know that the legislation we are working on here tonight is not—and I repeat, is not—the food for peace program. This is not the program under which we export millions and millions of dollars worth of food to other countries to feed poor people. That is not what is in this bill at all, despite some of the arguments the Members will undoubtedly hear which would lead them to believe that.

Mr. Chairman, there are many, many other arguments I would like to present here this evening on this overall program. I am not going to use any more time at this point, but as we get to the amending process we will have more comments and facts and figures to bring to the Members. What I present this evening is symbolic, and are some examples of the foreign aid program not working.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. I want to commend the gentleman for his statement, and also for doing what he has described and stated that he has been doing, namely, bringing information to us, information that is very helpful in making up our minds on how we should vote on these various issues that come before us. I would also like to say that I follow the gentleman's general philosophy about these programs.

I think that much of foreign aid can be and in fact is helpful and beneficial, and that most of us could agree with it and support it. I think it is important, for example, that we maintain the strength of Israel and that we have a strong Middle East program, as this bill does.

I also share with the gentleman his concern and at least to some extent opposition to the huge role we are assigning to the international financial institutions. I think this is where we are really letting down, where we ought to be much more careful, where we ought to have many more guidelines, and where we ought to have a lot more control than we have now.

I think the American people certainly are correct when they criticize us for putting these millions and billions of dollars in these programs over which we have so little and sometimes no control at all.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's comments.

Since he raised that one issue, I would like to read another sentence from a Treasury memorandum that talks about what these programs are all about. The World Bank through the International Development Association, which Members will hear referred to as IDA, is the organization that makes soft loans—soft loans being loans for which there is no interest paid at all, less than 1 percent administrative cost, nothing to be repaid during the first 10 years. Incidentally, they tell us these IDA loans are not in default and most of them are really current. The truth is that most of them are still in the 10-year grace period, so there is no repayment scheduled.

But let me tell the Members what our Treasury Department says about IDA and whether or not in fact it is intended to help the poorest of the poor:

The concessional rate of interest paid to the Development Banks is substantially lower than the interest collected by the DFC's from ultimate borrowers.

We know some of the ultimate borrowers pay as high as 17 percent for what these banks get for practically nothing.

This difference results in a special "benefit" which accrues on these loans.

Obviously there is a benefit if one gets the money for nothing and reloans it for a high interest rate. There is a benefit. No question about that.

IDA and ADF follow the principle that these benefits should accrue to the government concerned.

We just have too many examples of the benefits accruing to the government concerned and never getting to the poorest of the poor that these foreign aid programs are intended to accomplish.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I join the gentleman from California (Mr. LAGOMARSINO) in expressing my personal appreciation to both the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) for the position they have taken on this legislation. They have not opposed it 100 percent, but it is refreshing to me after 5 years in Congress to see a committee coming forward with positions that are both pro and con on foreign aid but which at least question not only the premise of the foreign aid program but the actual operating details. It is a welcome change from the operation we have had in the past years.

I do not think it is the duty of any committee in the Congress to rubberstamp, a program, no matter how detailed the program is described by the agency that administers it. Certainly our colleague, the gentleman from Florida, Mr. Young, in their "Dear Colleague" letters has brought to our attention a great many details. He has done a service not only to his constituency but also to the entire Congress, as well as the people of the United States. I think the gentleman deserves a great deal of commendation.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his comment.

I do not particularly relish the role of leading an attack on a program so well established. I would much rather have the administration lobbyist coming into my office and patting me on the back and saying: "You have done a great job."

Rather than what they do say, rather than what they do have other colleagues say in their "Dear Colleague" letters, I would rather have a different role. But if someone does not focus the spotlight and give sufficient attention to this issue, we will double our foreign aid program and still the poorest of the poor will not get the benefits, the rich will continue to get richer, and the poor are still going to be poor, the way it has always been.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I commend the gentleman for his well thought out remarks and for his deep concern and consideration as to what happens to our country abroad through the various programs we have established during the years, and I might add that some of them will come back to haunt us a little bit.

Mr. Chairman, it is inevitable that Members of Congress will face problems and difficulties of one degree or another with the U.S. foreign aid program.

I disagree with many of the aid programs included in this bill, and support others.

I believe that most of us agree that it is our responsibility—and in the best interests of the United States—to provide military and economic assistance to allied nations, who support U.S. efforts to promote freedom and oppose Communist totalitarianism throughout the world.

We hope that those nations which receive our assistance will feel a kinship for the United States and its people.

We expect such nations who benefit from U.S. foreign aid to treat us properly and fairly in all our dealings, and to put equity in the forefront of their relationship with the American people.

This principle applies to business relations, when American business people and their companies are involved in contractual agreements to provide goods, technology, and services in foreign countries that receive our assistance, as well as to government-to-government relations.

As Congressman representing the people and companies of Arizona's Fourth Congressional District, I have been involved with the State Department in a problem faced by the Del E. Webb Co. which in 1972 completed construction of the magnificent Tela-La Ceiba Highway in Honduras.

The Del Webb Co. has for 5 years been attempting to settle a claim for cost overruns on the Tela-La Ceiba project, but the claim has previously been rejected by the Government of Honduras.

The Honduran Government is currently reconsidering the Del Webb claim, on the basis of a reduced amount submitted by the U.S. company last November.

I believe that the Government of Honduras is to be commended for its efforts to reconsider this claim, and hopefully to arrive at a negotiated settlement with the Del Webb Co.

Fair and equitable treatment of American companies overseas, that in good faith provide people of foreign nations with the products of American technology and expertise, is an important hallmark of good relations with the United States.

● Mr. SANTINI. Mr. Chairman, during the examination of the foreign aid appropriations, I feel that it is most relevant that my colleagues be aware of a conflict involving the Government of Honduras. This Government will receive $20 million in foreign economic assistance and $2.5 million for military sales credits if our legislative proposals are implemented.

The Del Webb Corp. is an important business contributor to the States of Nevada and Arizona. It is among the top 10 general contractors in the United States. This corporation has been trying for the past 5 years to settle a claim for cost-overruns on the Tela-La Ceiba Highway project. The Webb Corp. has grounded its claim upon these considerations:

First. Approximately 1,800 change orders occurred during the course of constructing the highways.

Second. Extraordinary quantity overruns were experienced—roadway excavations alone show 66 and 37 percent quantity overruns on the two highways.

Third. Shifting of personnel and equipment occurred as required by the supervising engineer, though Webb Corp. believed such changes to have been unreasonable.

Fourth. The highways required an additional 17 months to complete. All requests for extensions of time were granted and no liquidated damages were assessed against Webb.

This claim has been previously rejected by the Honduran Government. The Webb Corp., however, resubmitted its claim on the basis of reducing the settlement by $1 million in November of 1978. The Government of Honduras is currently reconsidering the claim, and it is hoped that it will arrive at a negotiated settlement with the Del Webb Corp.

I cannot interject my judgment on the strengths and weaknesses of this plea. I have been informed, however, that this claim has not received deliberative consideration.

My information is that this sizeable contract obligation has been summarily disregarded in a callous exercise of governmental indifference. I hope this assertion is invalid and that this claimed deficit will receive the balanced consideration that appears warranted by the available facts.

When a government receives so much in the way of help from our Nation, certainly one of our leading corporate entities deserves, at the very least, a fair disposition of its claims.●

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, while I extend a great deal of credit to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG), for the many issues he has raised about this bill, nevertheless, I do not want it thought that this committee has been merely a committee that has rubberstamped what any administration requested in the way of appropriations for foreign aid. Anybody who remembers the long career of Otto Passman knows that there were more than a few questions asked, some of them good and some bad.

I would also point out in my own case that I have only voted for foreign aid in the last 3 years. When I first came to the Congress I came here fully expecting to vote for foreign aid, but when I looked at the specifics of the bills before us in those days I just could not because I thought the programs in many places were misdirected. I thought the investments in many areas were pretty bad. I thought that the aid, in the main, did not get down to the poorest of the poor as both the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG), and the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG), have indicated. But if you have looked closely at foreign aid, as I have tried to do since I have been a member of this subcommittee, you have to recognize the fact that the direction of our foreign aid program has changed and has changed substantially in the last 3 or 4 years, especially since 1973.

The Members are going to hear a lot of things about this bill today and Wednesday. You will hear that this bill is a huge bill and that we cannot afford it, that we are spending outrageously for the international banks whereas the fact is that this bill, if you look at it in total, above last year's bill by about 9 percent.

That amounts to an inflation factor plus 1 percent. I really do not think that anybody can seriously suggest that this bill, therefore, is a runaway appropriation because the facts just do not bear that out.

Second, this bill has been cut by 13 percent from the administration's request, $1,100,000,000, the largest cut of any appropriation bill this year. And, in fact, the area of the most controversy where attempts will be made to cut the bill even further, has been cut by a larger amount than any other section in the bill.

You are going to hear that this bill is a giveaway program and, therefore, we should not support it. The fact is that that is nonsense. The fact is that 87 percent of our AID program winds up financing purchases of American goods in the good old U.S.A., which benefits American workers, and American business. We do not ship bushel baskets full of dollars across the waters. That is not the way foreign aid works. You give people drawing rights; you give them purchasing rights; and that is what happens. If we are really going to be honest about it, the single biggest beneficiary of foreign aid in the world is the American worker who has a job because of this program, making products or providing services that this program helps facilitate, or the business that does the same thing. We also have to remember that very large amounts of funds contributed by other countries to foreign aid programs wind up being spent in this country, also benefiting our own workers and our own companies. I am, frankly, amazed that that fact gets lost in the shuttle.

Another fact: This bill is $7.3 billion, but the fact is that 10 percent of it, $700 million, is not economic aid at all. It is military assistance, which is related to our own military security in many instances. Twenty-five percent of the bill represents the Middle East security package. That leaves $4.8 billion in economic aid, about 1 percent of the Federal budget. Big deal! One percent of the Federal budget! And 20 percent of that is callable capital only, which means that it will never be put out. It will never contribute to our deficit in any way. That brings it down to $3.8 billion, and of that amount 800,000,000 bucks, 22 percent, is in this bill to help us keep faith with commitments that were made by past administrations to the funding of programs such as the international banks.

You will hear how outrageous it is that we provide money to the "dreaded seven": Uganda, Mozambique, Angola, Cuba, Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam. The fact is that none of those countries receives any direct aid from the United State, and the support they receive from multinational institutions is miniscule, eight-tenths of 1 percent of the total amount in this bill.

Fact No. 3: There is no way that this House by any amendment that it can pass can limit the amount of money that the banks provide for those countries—those few countries who belong to the banks that are consistently mentioned—because the bank charters prohibit taking any money which is earmarked, and most people, I think, understand that.

The question is whether we want to go through the trouble of explaining that fact of life to the people we represent. That is the real question. What Congress has to decide on the question of direct and indirect aid to countries we do not like is whether we believe that the political and economic stability which those institutions provide or help to provide, is more valuable to us, whether that is more important to us than trying to punish a few countries we do not like with an amendment that has no effect anyway.

You will also hear that aid to the banks is bad because we have no control over how they spend the money. Let me ask you a question: If you want to avoid money being poured down a rat hole, how would you rather have that money handled? Would you rather have it handled by State Department types who in judging the worthwhileness of projects have to take into account the political question of whether the recipient country will like or dislike us, based upon how we handle that project, because that is what you have got to do in your regular direct program.

Or would you rather have that money spent by hard-nosed Republican-type bankers, people who are going to look at those projects and say, "Hey, fellows, in economic terms, that does not measure up to third-grade economics. We ain't going to fund it."

That is what you can do with international banks that you cannot do with our direct aid program.

If I had my way, I would much prefer to see a much higher portion of our foreign aid provided through the banks and less provided through AID, because I think the banks in the last analysis are a lot harder nosed than our own AID programs.

You have heard that the banks do not help poor people. The facts are that the congressional research study shows that the banks have significantly shifted their programs to emphasize aid to the poor.

You will not hear from the opponents of this legislation, that the banks are a good deal for American business and American workers. You will not hear from them that for every dollar we contribute to the banks, that those banks spend $2.35 in this country, because we only contribute about 25 percent of the total share.

It is a good deal for us, for American workers and for American business. We ought to recognize that.

You will also not hear in this most pragmatic year that there are 70 million people in the Third World who do face starvation each year.

There are 1 billion who lack, not convenient water supplies, but safe water supplies, and the incredible suffering that results from that fact is something this bill tries to do something marginal about. We really do not affect them at the core. All we can do is try to affect them a little bit around the edges. That is all you can expect of this program. With all its faults, it does it better than anything else that we know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) has expired.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Maryland yield 2 more minutes?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I think we are running on a constraint of time. I wonder if we could finish this, since we have one gentlewoman who wants to talk who has to leave in a few minutes.

The gentleman has had his 10 minutes.

Let us call on some of the others.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would like to have one of his speakers go ahead because of the time element, I would be pleased to grant that. If not, we will proceed.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, that would be a very great courtesy to the gentlewoman from Maryland who has to leave at a certain time.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maryland (Ms. MIKULSKI).

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak generally in favor of the foreign appropriations bill that we have under discussion, but only really with the proviso to the effect to look at the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG). I am going to support the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG), because I mean it as a signal to the international financial institutions that certain changes in their policies must occur if they wish to continue to receive full financial support from the Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I was one of the supporters of the original Marshall Plan where the money was designed to help people pull themselves up by their own bootstraps; however, now, as I scrutinize the Foreign Aid programs, it is my opinion that the IFI's subsidize American competition, destroy the social fabric of the rich developed countries and help the rich and the status quo.

It is my feeling that the IFI's must create a development strategy that is truly helpful to those people eating two bowls of rice a day and not those slurping up two martinis for lunch at the taxpayers' expense.

The second point that I want to make is that the IFI's must pay much more attention to the women in particular of the Third World. The Third World is poor, and it is starving. When we take a look at it, when we go into the villages, we see the women are the poorest of the poor, and they tend to be the most abused.

Studies have shown that the higher the level of education of women, the more improved their economic status. When women's economic status improves, the mortality rate and the population rate go down and the quality of life improves. We must try to give special attention to the Third World women.

Our planet is no longer young. Depletion of energy resources is becoming increasingly evident with each passing year. International development is not directed with a country's culture and supply of natural resources in mind. The IFI's and all countries that give foreign aid must examine these important factors and make them the basis of their aid programs. We must take a look at a country's needs, take a look at the country's resources, and take a look at the country's culture and supply of natural resources and then try to help the people develop their own resources.

Mr. Chairman, right now what we are providing to the nations of the Third World is not aid but a toxic substance.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE).

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG) for his very kind and thoughtful remarks. As the gentleman said, I have been on the committee longer than any other Member—18 years. This would have been my 20th year, but I got off the committee for 2 years.

I have seen a lot of Members come and go on that committee. I once stated to the lovely gentlewoman from Nebraska as she was sitting here: "You know, at one time on this committee the ranking Republican Member was Gerry Ford and he became President of the United States, the second ranking Republican on the committee was Mel Laird, and he became Secretary of HEW and Secretary of Defense, and the third ranking Republican on that committee was JOHNNY RHODES, and he, as a Republican, became the minority leader. The fourth ranking Republican on that committee was SIL CONTE, and I am still there." I have not moved very much, but it has been interesting because I have worked with a lot of fine legislators. I have seen a lot of Members come and go.

The gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG) has really impressed me as a man who is dedicated to his job, a man who does his homework and does it well. I would say to the gentleman, "You have done it as well, Mr. YOUNG, as anyone I have seen in the 18 years I have been on that subcommittee. You are certainly to be commended for it, and your people are really fortunate to have such a hard-working conscientious individual. You fight a good hard fight, but you fight it clean and you fight it on the issues."

Mr. Chairman, since the late forties, guided by her devotion to democratic principles and the generosity of her people, America has provided assistance to the less developed countries battling for freedom—that is freedom from want, from ignorance and freedom from the military dominance of hostile neighbors. Beginning with the Marshall plan, designed to rectify the war torn economy of Europe, the United States has been a leader in the development efforts of those less fortunate nations. This leadership has been expanded and shared through affiliation and support of the United Nations funds, the military assistance programs, the Agency for International Development, and the international financial institutions.

The programs have traditionally been undertaken for humanitarian and political reasons, not for the economic benefits that might accrue to the United States, but times have changed. Mr. Chairman, with each passing day, the nations of the world become increasingly interdependent. And the fact that economic decisions made in Bonn can affect what the dollar will buy in Tokyo is illustrative of such interdependence. Trade is increasingly being recognized as a key component of U.S. economic welfare. One out of every eight jobs in manufacturing and one-third of all productive acreage is geared toward export production. Of these exports, 40 percent are shipped to the developing world.

Our interdependence is evident also with regard to imports. The developing nations control many raw materials crucial to our industrial strength. Control of the supplies of bauxite, rubber, tin and copper are only a few examples of the potential leverage wielded by these nations over the industrialized world. And of equal importance is the influence of these nations in the solution of major world problems currently plaguing the globe—economic instability, rapid population growth, adequate food and energy production and environmental deterioration. There is little doubt that the world's greatest reservoir of marginal productivity is the still underdeveloped and underutilized physical and human resources of the developing countries. Foreign assistance is a key to releasing this untapped potential. By raising the purchasing power of these nations, releasing new resources and developing new markets for both poor and rich, higher levels of economic activity can be created within and between all countries. In essence, the developing nations of the South, could over the next two decades become one of the crucial engines of growth in this world.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, interdependence has linked not only states, but men, requiring a global approach to the problems confronting us today. Foreign aid is such an approach.

Through the appropriate mix of bilateral and multilateral aid, directed for infrastructure as well as New Directions projects, the U.S. aid program not only assists in development, but helps to engender the managerial and technical know-how which will enable these nations to devise and implement their own development strategies. This process is not only costly, it is time consuming.

It is a recent revelation that true development must be an indigenous "grass roots" process. And such a process does not happen overnight. We realize now that we must share, rather than shove our western values and traditions upon the developing world, and that we must judge their progress by standards which realistically take into account the obstacles they face. Because we do not readily perceive tangible results, acceptable to our interpretation of success, does not imply that progress has not been achieved. Mr. Chairman, often we cannot see the forest through the trees. We are so deeply enmeshed in the process that the effects are not so easily seen. Yet, viewed over the long run, progress has been made. A recent study revealed that within the past 25 years, development has yielded substantial results:

The amount of food per capita has kept pace with increased populations in the developing countries since World War II;

Life expectancy is now 50 years, an achievement which took only 25 years to accomplish—for Europe it took 100 years;

Infant mortality rates have dropped substantially;

Many diseases have been eliminated;

The literacy rate has increased to 50 percent; and Primary and secondary school enrollments have increased six-fold.

Yes, true progress has been achieved, but we cannot stop now. Man continues to press the generous bounty of nature and often with sad results. At this time 930 million persons in the developing world are undernourished. 1.2 billion do not have access to safe drinking water. 800 million lack basic housing. 800 million are deprived of fundamental health care services. And 1.1 billion lack even the most rudimentary education. Our foreign assistance programs deal specifically with the means by which we challenge this grim reality and deal with the dangers that we will face as fellow-travellers on the planet Earth.

Mr. Chairman, the debate we are immersed in is reminiscent of a debate which took place just three decades ago. Then as now, those who would retreat from world leadership clashed with those who recognized that it is our duty to provide it. Then as now, the debate took place against the background of public clamoring for lower taxes, anti-inflation programs and concern with foreign competition to U.S. industry. Then as now, hunger, unemployment, economic stagnation and resultant despair—those handmaidens of political unrest—plagued the less fortunate members of the global community. Then as now, concern was evident over the strain of U.S. financial and material resources being poured down a proverbial "rathole." Thirty years ago, arguments were put forth by the late great Senator Vandenburg which have applicability today—bipartisan unity, realism and self-interest for the United States—were invoked to promote foreign aid.

The following words of Senator Vandenburg ring as true today as they did when they were first spoken:

> It would be a far happier circumstance if we could close our eyes to reality, comfortably retire within our bastions and dream of an isolated and prosperous peace. But that which was once our luxury, would now become our folly.

Now more than ever, America's prosperity cannot be assured in a broken world. In 1948 this Nation's leaders were plagued by the same anxities which disturb us today. Yet after careful weighing of the costs and benefits of aid, they responded positively. The Marshall plan thus became a reality. Mr. Chairman, we too are confronted with that same debate from which emerged America's first giant step into the foreign aid arena. Unfortunately the debate of today centers around cuts and restrictive amendments which in essence constitute a giant step backward. Shall we retreat knowing full well the dangers involved in doing so, or shall we support this well-trimmed bill which represents a mere 1¼ percent of total Federal expenditure? I urge that the latter course be taken, if for no other reason than for the self-interest of the United States.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. McHUGH).

Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McHUGH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill before us provided that the amendment to be offered by my good friend and distinguished colleague from Maryland, Mr. LONG, to reduce funds to two multilateral banks, is incorporated into the measure.

I am convinced that some reduction in foreign aid appropriations is inevitable. I believe that Mr. LONG's amendment is the most effective way to control and target that reduction without cutting much-needed assistance to the hungry and the poor in other nations.

Assigning priorities among many deserving programs is a difficult task. However, if we wish to reduce the funding available for foreign aid, we must carefully and thoughtfully determine where we wish the burden of that reduction to fall. I believe the gentleman from Maryland has found that area in which a reduction can do the least harm, while furthering our own national policy goals.

Even with the reduction proposed by Mr. LONG, the funding levels for the International Development Agency (IDA) and the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) will still increase over fiscal year 1978. The careful targeting of Mr. LONG's amendment emphasizes our concern over the development policies of the multilateral banks, while reaffirming our basic goal of aiding the poor through bilateral humanitarian aid.

The multilateral banks have had an abysmal record meeting the needs of the poorest of the poor in their recipient nations. For example: Fewer than half of IDB projects in 1977 were even designed to reach the poor.

By preserving our bilateral programs, which include the Peace Corps and the Agency for International Development, we underline our commitment to aiding the world's least privileged. By reducing the funding for the IDA and IDB, we emphasize our desire for a more effective multilateral aid program that truly improves the lot of the poor, rather than a series of loans whose primary beneficiaries are the well-to-do and those in power in the recipient nations.

Let us continue to help those in need the world over. And, if reductions become necessary, let us make certain that we reduce funding only for those agencies which have failed to adequately meet that basic goal.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill and the Long amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McHUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

In my earlier comments, I made some comments about how the subcommittee had done its work.

I wanted to wait until the gentleman from New York (Mr. McHUGH) took the floor before I said that he, as the newest member of the subcommittee, has really studied more and become more aware of the issues confronting our subcommittee on this legislation and has done just an outstanding job that I wanted to pay him that compliment publicly.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG) for his very kind and thoughtful remarks.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill as reported from committee. It is the product of many months of hearings by our Subcommittee on Foreign Operations, ably chaired by our colleague, Mr. LONG of Maryland. In my judgment, this bill will allow us to meet our international responsibilities without compromising our responsibility to address the very real problems we face at home.

Although Mr. LONG has explained the bill in some detail, there are a couple of points that are worth repeating.

The first is that our subcommittee has already substantially reduced the administration request. Indeed, this is one of the smallest appropriation bills to come before the House. As Mr. LONG explained, the total cut made by the subcommittee amounts to $1.1 billion, which is 13 percent below the administration's request. Moreover, it is important to note that another 13 percent of the funds in this bill, or $966.5 million, represents callable capital which will not result in any actual spending by the Government.

The most significant reduction is in the President's request covering U.S. contributions to the international financial institutions (IFI's). The budget request for the IFI's was cut by $876 million. I strongly believe that any further reduction would make us appear to be reneging on our international obligations.

For example, while other nations completed their contributions to the fourth replenishment of the International Development Association in 1976, to date we have contributed only 50 percent of the pledge we made in 1973. The administration maintains that continued failure to appropriate the requested funds would put us in default on a legally binding international obligation. Regardless of the legal questions involved, our failure to fulfill this pledge would bring into question our ability to make and keep international agreements.

Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this committee will reject amendments aimed at reducing still further our contributions to the IFI's, as well as any amendment for an across-the-board reduction since such an amendment would also seriously affect these institutions.

Our subcommittee also made substantial reductions in the three military assistance programs funded by this bill. In part, we did so because of testimony we received regarding continuing violations of basic human rights in a number of the countries to which the administration proposed to provide assistance. However, we chose not to make specific country by country reductions because we found it difficult to draw meaningful distinctions between alleged human rights violators, and to fully evaluate the legitimacy of the claims presented by witnesses.

Many of us were also concerned that some of these nations were spending too much of their own resources on arms, resources that could better be used to meet their very pressing economic and social problems. At the same time, the administration failed to provide compelling evidence that its request for many of these countries was truly related to our security needs.

I would like to comment on this last point briefly. President Carter has stated that:

The United States will henceforth view arms transfers as an exceptional foreign policy implement, to be used only in instances where it can be demonstrated that the transfer will contribute to our national security.

However, we concluded that too many officials continue to view our assistance as an ordinary instrument for promoting better relations with other governments, or as a method for assuring a store of political influence for future contingencies. These are not compelling national security objectives. Each is important to our overall foreign policy, but neither is directly related to U.S. security needs.

Finally, smaller reductions than the foregoing were made in the requests for the Agency for International Development, the Peace Corps, and a number of agencies funded through the State Department. However, we made no change in the administration's request for Israel or for other nations in the Middle East, believing it would be highly inappropriate to do so at this sensitive time.

Here again, Mr. Chairman, I would urge the members of this committee to reject any across-the-board reduction that may be offered. This type of approach, while politically attractive today, is neither reasonable nor sound and is certainly not sensitive to the diverse programs funded under this bill.

For example, should we agree to an amendment that may be offered to reduce funding across the board by 8 percent, a reduction of approximately $150 million in military and economic assistance for Israel would result. At a time when our special relationship with Israel is in question, I do not think a reduction of this magnitude serves our interests or the cause of peace in the Middle East.

If such an amendment were passed, funding for some programs would be reduced below the amount we are providing this year. For example, an 8-percent across-the-board reduction would reduce funding for international disaster assistance below the amount provided in fiscal year 1978, despite reports of renewed drought in the Sahel and threatened famine in eastern Africa from a locust plague. As the minority views point out in the committee report:

Another positive program is our International Disaster Assistance program . . . We are deeply committed to assisting people devastated by natural disasters. It is our view that this program is truly representative of the goodwill of the American people.

I hope this committee will oppose the meat-ax approach.

WHY A FOREIGN AID PROGRAM?

Mr. Chairman, I realize how difficult it is to support this bill today. It seems to lack any significant consistency. Understandably, the American people are primarily concerned about our economic problems at home. Many fail to appreciate the need for a foreign aid program.

Of course, one reason to support a foreign assistance program is to help alleviate the ancient enemies of mankind: Hunger, poverty, and disease.

Last January Norman Borlaug, the American scientist often described as the father of the green revolution and a distinguished winner of the Nobel Prize, told Vice President Mondale:

If we look at the future, we have to look at it with fear.

His meaning is evident when one considers some of the relevant and depressing statistics:

There are 1.2 billion people throughout the world without access to safe drinking water or public health facilities; 1 billion people do not consume enough calories to meet minimum daily adult requirements; between 450 and 750 million people are chronically malnourished; 550 million people cannot read or write; 220 million people live in urban areas without adequate shelter; and 26 people die every minute as a result of hunger.

The people who suffer most are children and women, especially pregnant and nursing mothers. It is estimated that there are 860 million children under 15 years of age in the developing world:

Half of them suffer from debiliating diseases likely to have long-term effects; a third of them are undernourished; and almost 300 million of them are not and will not be able to attend school.

Surely, we will not be indifferent to these figures, Mr. Chairman. Surely, we will bear a fair share of the burden, as we always have in the past. As a free people fortunate to live in a nation with one of the highest standards of living in the world, surely we cannot fail to respond.

Beyond our traditional humanitarian concerns, our foreign aid program is vital to our own interests. Our national security will be affected by how successful the developing nations are in increasing agricultural production, curbing birth rates, and becoming more self-sufficient.

In real economic terms, our economy has become increasingly linked to the nations of the developing world. Like it or not, the United States has become more dependent upon them for the raw materials needed to fuel our economy. Two-thirds of our imports are essential resources, or goods we cannot readily produce.

For example, we are dependent upon imports for approximately 98 percent of our cobalt and manganese requirements, 93 percent of our tin, 85 percent of our bauxite, 71 percent of our nickel, 59 percent of our zinc ore, 3¢ percent of our iron ore, and 15 percent of our copper requirements. And, of course, there is our continuing dependence upon foreign oil. Many of the developing nations are primary suppliers of these materials.

Furthermore, these nations are vital export markets for us, and they offer the best opportunity for expanding our markets in the future. Exports now contribute almost $200 billion to our gross national product. They provide one out of every eight manufacturing jobs in the United States. And, for every one of these jobs, another is created in a supporting industry.

Fully one-third of our agricultural produce is exported, and half of these exports go to the developing nations. For example, last year they purchased 50 percent of our exports of cotton, 65 percent of our wheat exports, and nearly 70 percent of our rice exports. Equally important, each dollar of agricultural exports stimulates more than a dollar's worth of output in a food related industry.

Today, $1 out of every $3 of U.S. corporate profits is derived from international activities, and the developing countries host over 20 percent of total U.S. direct investment worldwide. Earnings on these investments amounted to $7 billion in 1975 and almost $11 billion in 1976. The rate of return on our investments in the developing countries was more than twice the rate of return on our direct investments in the developed countries. These investments help expand the output of raw materials critical to our economy and expand markets for U.S. exports by stimulating demand in the host countries.

It is also clear that our political objectives cannot be achieved solely through the maintenance of our Armed Forces. Regional stability and peace in the Middle East, Africa, and East Asia cannot be achieved without the cooperation of the developing nations. Ties to them are essential for deploying our Armed Forces, maintaining access to straits, ports, and aviation facilities, and to achieving progress on vital issues affecting peace, such as arms restraint and nuclear nonproliferation.

Mr. Chairman, the social unrest which breeds conflict can only be prevented if economic growth and a more equitable distribution of resources are realized. As Pope John XXIII so eloquently put it:

In a world of constant want, there is no peace. . . .

MYTHS ABOUT FOREIGN AID

Unfortunately, much of what passes for fact about our foreign aid program would better be described as myth.

For example, the prevailing view is that foreign aid is a giveaway program, a kind of international welfare system. However, much of our bilateral program funded through AID is in the form of loans that must eventually be repaid. Moreover, some of our bilateral aid is tied to the purchase of goods and services in the United States, and that means business and jobs for Americans.

Last year over 2,900 firms in this country received more than $600 million of AID appropriations for commodities they provided to the developing countries. And 129 colleges and universities received $130 million in AID appropriations for contracts and grants in connection with the Agency's work overseas.

The same phenomenon pertains with respect to expenditures by the international financial institutions such as the World Bank. For every dollar of paid-in capital we have contributed to these insitutions, they have spent $2 here to purchase goods and services.

These institutions have come under attack because we have less control over how their funds are used, which is true. But every dollar we contribute leverages $3 in subscriptions and contributions from other nations, thus spreading the burden more equitably. Since these institutions use paid-in capital to borrow extensively in world capital markets, our contributions actually leverage far more than $3. It is estimated, for example, that every $1 that the U.S. contributes to the World Bank generates more than $36 in resources for bank lending in the developing world.

To be sure, these institutions sometimes finance the production of commodities which are competitive with American products. However, they all have well established policies to preclude financing commodities which are, or could become, surplus commodities on world markets. Moreover, our bill includes two sections which would prohibit the Export-Import Bank and the Overseas Private Investment Corporation from financing the production of such commodities, and direct our executive representatives to the international financial institutions (IFI's) to oppose lending for such commodities.

For these reasons I hope that this committee will oppose any amendments to establish protectionist walls around certain domestic industries. The American people have a vital interest in a fair and open trading system. In the long run we lose much more than we gain from an excess of protectionism.

Mr. Chairman, we expect other amendments to be offered which would place conditions on our contributions to the IFIs by country. Specifically, we can anticipate that attempts will be made to restrict "indirect" aid to Angola, Cambodia, Cuba, Laos, Mozambique, Uganda, and Vietnam.

Of course, these amendments are prompted by the objections we all have to the governments of these countries. Nevertheless, such amendments are ill-conceived. The IFIs are precluded by their charters from accepting any of our contributions with such conditions attached. To attach them, therefore, would be destructive of the banks. Surely, we are not going to effectively cut off all our contributions to the banks for this reason?

Mr. Chairman, another myth about foreign aid is that the United States is contributing far more to the developing countries than other developed nations. While that may have been true at one time, it is no longer the case. In absolute terms, the U.S. program is larger than that of any other nation. However, as a percentage of gross national product, we rank in the bottom quarter of all non-Communist donor countries in terms of official development assistance.

For example, while Sweden spends 1 percent of its GNP on development assistance, we spend only 0.22 percent of our GNP. Significantly, that figure has been declining over the last decade. In 1966, we spent 0.41 percent of our GNP on development aid. As might be expected, official development assistance as a percentage of our Federal budget reflects this decline. The funds in this bill amount to 1.29 percent of our budget.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, there is the most damning myth of all, the myth that our foreign assistance does not work. The record shows otherwise. Of course, it is impossible to distinguish foreign assistance from other factors that affect development. However, it surely has played a role in helping to promote some accomplishments of which we can be proud.

Between 1950 and 1975, for example, the developing countries achieved higher growth rates than either they or the developed nations achieved in the past. Substantial increases in life expectancy have occurred in many countries. The number of children in primary schools has tripled since 1950 and the number of students in secondary schools has increased sixfold during the same period. The battle against communicable diseases has had results, with smallpox now confined to a small area of Africa. There are many other accomplishments which could be cited.

Some may ask why we must continue to provide assistance if the program has been so successful. The answer, very simply, is that the problem is immense. There are no quick fixes, and therefore we can only persevere with others to deal realistically and responsibly with the problems.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Chairman, I understand the mood of the House and the country. That mood is not generally supportive of foreign aid. Nonetheless, we must recognize that foreign aid is an essential element of a foreign policy. This bill represents a modest, but vital, contribution to a sound foreign policy. It reflects our traditional humanitarian values. Beyond that, however, it is in our national interest. As former President Kennedy put it:

If a free society cannot help the many who are poor, it cannot save the few who are rich.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope the members of this committee will approve the work of our subcommittee, work which has taken months, and will approve the bill which is before the committee at this time.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the very distinguished member of the subcommittee, the gentlewoman from Nebraska (Mrs. SMITH).

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska, Mr. Chairman, first I would like to express my appreciation of the dedicated leadership of the chairman of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee, Mr. LONG, and the ranking minority member, Mr. YOUNG.

Now, I would like to take this opportunity to speak against the foreign assistance appropriations bill and for the Long amendment which will be before the House of Representatives. As a member of the Subcommittee on Foreign Operations of the Committee on Appropriations, I have had an opportunity to closely follow this legislation and all of the controversies which surround it.

Although the full Appropriations Committee has reduced this bill from the original budget request by more than $1 billion, it is still $600 million more than the fiscal 1978 bill. This causes me great concern. I was elected to represent the Third District of Nebraska. The people of my district are as generous as other Americans. They never hesitate to help a neighbor in distress. But their feelings about the generosity of the U.S. Government when it comes to sending their money overseas is another matter. They want to see some results. They have not been shown any.

As other Members of the House of Representatives strive to do, I try to keep in close touch with the people who sent me here. In that regard, each year I send out a questionnaire. Of course, it is not a scientific survey in the technical sense of the word, but I analyze the results very carefully. This year, I asked the question: "Do you favor a plan by the Carter administration to increase the amount of economic assistance the U.S. provides to foreign countries?"

There is no doubt about the feeling of my constituents on this matter. A total of 95 percent responded, "No." That negative feeling is being reflected throughout the entire country. The results of the latest Gallup poll indicate the deep dissatisfaction the American people have with our Government's foreign policy—a substantial part of which deals with the distribution of foreign aid.

Next to the high cost of living and inflation and unemployment, U.S. foreign policy is the most important problem facing this country today, according to the Gallup poll. This concern ranks above such problems as the energy situation, crime and lawlessness, and drug abuse. This surely is a sign that Americans are not happy with the direction of the current administration's foreign programs.

Mr. Chairman, I voted against this bill during both subcommittee and full committee consideration. While I support the $1 billion cut, I believe there are many, many other areas where this bill can be reduced. For more specific information on these areas, I would refer my colleagues to the minority views on this bill which appear on page 64 of the accompanying report and were signed by seven of my colleagues and myself.

One of the major problems I have with the foreign assistance program is the concept under which it is administered. This concern is well articulated in a June 27, 1978, article in the Washington Post.

It was written by Roger Darling, a Foreign Service officer who had the courage to speak his mind on a subject on which he has had first hand experience.

He says that:

Our present foreign assistance strategy substitutes foreign initiatives, values and resources for indigenous responsibility. It acts in the absence of indigenous concern for the poor and therefore evades the causes of the poverty. The aid is pure welfare—it stimulates no productivity. The aid encourages poor nations to continue with business-as-usual in the face of escalating human suffering and expanding poverty; it causes greater—not less—dependency on rich nations. The human needs strategy does not help solve Third World poverty—it expands it.

Mr. Darling has hit the nail right on the head. Our giveaway programs overseas are not helping the people we want to help. Those who do get the aid we send have no incentive to improve their station in life. In fact, many foreign governments and their people resent our assistance. Our foreign aid program through the years has not won us any friends, but it may have created many enemies. Yet, we have poured out since the end of World War II nearly $200 billion in foreign assistance. It has helped our cause in the world very little.

Mr. Chairman, with the approval of proposition 13 in the State of California, there is now a new awareness on the part of many of my colleagues to save tax money; to spend less. I suggest that a good place to start is with this bill now before us.

I want to turn now to the issue of funds for the so-called international lending institutions. It works like this. We give tax money to be loaned or given to foreign countries which claim to need some sort of special assistance. In return, we have no say over how the money is spent or to whom it is loaned or given. In fact, inquiries from Congress about some of the procedures of these organizations are taken as an affront. We are told, in effect: "Now that we have your money, how dare you inquire as to how it is being disbursed."

No, Mr. Chairman, what I have described to you is not a fairy tale. It is the truth. At this point, I would like to commend my colleague on the Foreign Operations Subcommittee (Mr. YOUNG) for his efforts in exposing some of the abuses in this phase of our foreign aid program. He has pointed out how the taxpayer's money is being sent to Communist Vietnam after being "laundered" by India and how American dollars are going to Castro to help Cuba expand its subversive activities in Africa.

I am pledging my support to all efforts to substantially reduce our payments to these international financial organizations who use our money to flaunt the foreign policy directives of the Congress.

Mr. Chairman, time and time again, proponents of increased American aid to these international lending institutions have come before the Foreign Operations Subcommittee and said that if we reduce our contributions we will somehow be violating commitments we have made to these organizations.

However, I would like to point out that all of our so-called commitments—under the law—are subject to approval by the Congress for funds. If any commitments to these organizations are being made by representatives of the current administration, they do not have the force of law and are certainly not binding on this Congress. Let me refer you to the law. Public Law 95–118, which authorizes U.S. participation in these international lending institutions contains the following clause:

> The Congress * * * notes that the availability of funds for the United States contribution to the international financial institutions is subject to the appropriations process.

Mr. Chairman, the "appropriations process" to which the law refers is the process in which we are now engaged. If we decide to substantially reduce our contributions to these institutions, we have violated no commitment. We are the ones who are determining that commitment. The only pressure we should be feeling is that of the taxpayer whose funds we are committing. This is something we must never forget.

There has been much pressure put to bear on the Members of the House in recent weeks to oppose any further reduction in this bill. The administration has gone so far as to issue misleading statements about the content of that bill. As you know, I represent an agricultural area of this great country. Most of my constituents either directly or indirectly depend upon the sale of agricultural products for their livelihood.

Low farm prices and a decreasing export market causes them great concern. With that in mind, in recent days I received letters from the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce telling me that if I vote to cut this bill, I will be doing a great disservice to my State and congressional district. In addition, I have a press release issued by the Agency for International Development which indicates that the Federal Government has purchased $39.5 million in goods, services and agricultural products from Nebraska for the foreign aid program during the past year.

In the latter case, the press release is written so that it appears Nebraska would not get these sales if the foreign aid bill is not approved. It barely mentions that $37.7 million of the total purchased in Nebraska was for the food for peace program. As we all know, money for this program was contained in the Agriculture appropriations bill. Obviously, the AID press release was issued in an attempt to mislead the people of Nebraska about the content of this bill now before us. It is obvious that this bill cannot be defended with facts, it must be defended with innuendo and deception.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me point out that America has always been more than willing to help those in need. It has helped and will continue to help those countries and people who have suffered natural disasters. But I do not believe it is our responsibility nor our desire to throw away the taxpayer's money on ineffective, dubious programs that do more to create enemies than to win us friends. My opposition to this bill is staunch because of its size and its direction. If we are truly dedicated to saving money, reducing our budget deficit and rejecting programs that are not working then we must vote against this legislation.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WILSON), who I believe has yielded his time to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Maryland yield the time?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, if I can pick up where I left off before, I would simply like to say what I think this bill really represents to the United States.

I think, first of all, the bill is simply a signal to the world that we are not going to fade into a condition of "benign neglect." I think it will be a signal to the world that we are not yet frozen in the ice of our own indifference—if I can steal a quotation from Franklin D. Roosevelt which was issued on another subject many years ago—and, let me say I think it will signal to the world, and to our constituents, that Congress can separate, in a mature way, in our view of what we like from our view of our own national interests and resist the temptation to tie the hand of the President and deny him the flexibility which he needs to pursue our own national interests.

I think really what we have to ask is what is the real cost of this bill? I know many people back home simply think we are just shoveling out $50 or $60 billion every year abroad and that is because we have never bothered to tell them otherwise. But the fact is that this bill costs us about 1.4 percent of the entire Federal budget. It costs us about three-tenths of 1 percent of our gross national product. It costs each American, on a weekly basis, about 56 cents. That is less than a pack of cigarettes. Or, if you really want to get to an important comparison, it is about the cost of a bottle of beer in my district and maybe it is about half the cost of a bottle of beer when we buy it here in Washington.

The cost to each American in support of the banks is about 14 cents per week. That is about the cost of a pack of gum, 14 cents every week.

I hardly think that that is an outrageous cost for us to participate in the world. That is really what we are doing when we deal with the question of the banks.

We are going to spend $110 billion plus, come the end of this week, on the defense appropriation bill. We are probably going to add over $2 billion for a carrier that the President says he does not want.

I think the major argument on this bill is going to come on the chairman's amendment which will cut an area in this bill which we have already cut more than we have any other item in the bill.

I want to ask you this: How much more do you think we are going to be expending on the defense budget 10 years from now if we do not make some additional progress in trying to reduce the enormous turmoil and ferment which you can see all around the Third World if we do not begin to make even greater progress in attacking some of the economic problems which they face.

If you are going to vote against the program and vote to gut the program on the basis of some corruption, or because there are some specific parts of the program that you do not like, then what you ought to do is apply that same standard to every other program that comes to this floor. You ought to vote against CETA because, God knows, there is corruption in that program. You ought to vote against the medicare program. You ought to vote against the medicaid program. You ought to vote against the welfare program. You ought to vote against the highway programs. You ought to vote against cancer research because God knows there has been a lot of rip-offs in those programs as well. The GAO has found waste there as well as it has found waste in foreign aid. There is waste everywhere. We know that, but you do not throw out the baby with the bath.

But I ask you, when you consider the chairman's amendment on Wednesday, do you really want to put us in default on an international agreement entered into by previous Presidents?

I know what the law is in this country. Every Member knows what it is on this floor. But the fact is that, whether we like it or not, if we support the chairman's amendment we will be the only country in the world which is not meeting the amount of contribution which we have agreed to meet when that program was first brought before us.

I invite the Members to read the report of the authorizing committee on the bill when we pass the bill, providing for that fourth replenishment, because it indicated at that time that if we approved that authorization—and we did not approve it the first time, we turned it down—but we approved it the second time—and what that committee report said is that that would constitute in the eyes of the world an agreement on our part. I do not think Americans are in the habit of moving back on their agreements.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY).

Mr. GRASSLEY. I thank the gentleman from Florida for yielding, and I appreciate his leadership in this area.

I want to echo the words of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN), in which he said how refreshing it is to have a chairman and ranking minority member of this subcommittee who are not rubberstamps for the programs emanating from the committee. That is, indeed, very refreshing.

As I sat here through the debate today, trying to understand the reasons put forth by the proponents of foreign aid programs, as we were being told why they ought to be supported by the people of this country, I have heard that we ought to do so, first, because it is for our own economic prosperity, as if we can borrow ourselves into prosperity. It follows a little the philosophy that if we borrow and spend on domestic programs, we are going to be more prosperous; likewise the philosophy goes borrow, ship the money overseas, and let people buy products that are manufactured in America, and thus it is really for our own economic self-interest to have a foreign aid program because most of the money leads to economic prosperity at home. Next it is said that it is for the self-interest of the American people to support a foreign aid program. Other proponents indicated that it follows the humanitarian instincts of our people to support needy nations. And it has not been said, but I have a suspicion that perhaps maybe some of the reason we are asked to vote this aid is there are certain guilt feelings that this generation has because of the disparity between the wealthy nations of the world and the poor nations of the world, and we are trying to counteract that guilt feeling. So whether it is for our economic prosperity or whether it is for our self-interest, or whether it is because of our humanitarian instincts or whether it is because of some guilt feelings my generation might have, let me submit to the Members that it is one thing to do all these nice gestures today, for our generation in a sense to do them today by voting this massive amount of funds, and to pay for it today—which we are not doing—and quite another thing to borrow today, borrow ourselves deeper into debt, and leave it for a future generation to pick up the bill.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I apologize for interrupting the gentleman, but on that point I would like to say he has really struck a nerve. While we are borrowing money to pay for this foreign aid program, it might be interesting to note whom we are borrowing from. India, a country that is one of the largest recipients of our foreign aid program directly and indirectly, owns $774 million worth of our national debt, but we are in fact borrowing from India and we turn right around and give India money back in this foreign aid program. I appreciate the gentleman's raising that point.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I thank the gentleman. It sounds to me like the gentleman is saying that we are taking money out of one pocket and putting it in the other.

I submit to the Members that for whatever reason we are doing this—for our economic prosperity, for our self-interest, because of our humanitarian instincts, or because we have guilt feelings—it is one thing for us to do that today and pay for it today and assume the responsibilities of all of these so-called nice programs, and pay for it out of our own pockets so that you and I are not living high on the hog at the expense of future generations, and quite another thing—and wrongly so—for us to do it today this way outside of the confines of a balanced budget. We have not had a balanced budget for so many years it is difficult to remember the last one. We are not doing it within the concept of a balanced budget, and hence we should not be doing it.

Then, lastly, I want to compliment the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG), the chairman of the committee, because he so forcefully brought home, brought to the attention of all of us, the things that are wrong about this program in a "Dear Colleague" letter to us dated sometime during the month of July 1978.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) has again expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY).

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate my colleague yielding.

I think this Congress can be grateful for the work of the gentleman from Florida, as the gentleman in the well, the gentleman from Iowa, just mentioned, in trying to bring to us a better understanding of what the real results are of this program for which we have gotten into deficit financing in order to fund.

Mr. Chairman, I am especially appreciative of the fact that the gentleman in the well has continually brought out when this appropriation comes up, along with my colleague, the gentleman from Florida, how many absolutely unreasonable places this money is being spent. It is not carrying out the humanitarian objectives of the program. As a matter of fact, in some cases it goes to just outright waste and in no way reaches the people it is supposed to help.

Now, our colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin, a member of the committee, a minute ago tried to indicate that by supporting these cuts that the gentleman from Maryland has suggested and the gentleman from Florida has suggested that it is similar to just totally opposing the program. That just is not true.

I think that those who have argued today and will argue tomorrow that it is showing a lack of care for understanding by cutting some of this obvious waste out of the program, that these individuals who are suggesting this are insensitive, is just not a fair appraisal or a correct appraisal.

Mr. Chairman, I compliment the gentleman from Iowa for taking the time to review some of these areas where we should be saving the American taxpayers, who have to come up with this money or to cover the deficit that we have; so I compliment both the gentleman from Florida and the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) has again expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY).

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to compliment the chairman of the committee, because in the gentleman's "Dear Colleague" letter, the gentleman not only substantiated what the gentleman from Florida was saying, that this trickle-down theory of foreign aid is not even helping the people it was supposed to help, but the situation, in fact, is really deteriorating over the years because the disparity between the rich and the poor is becoming greater. As the gentleman said in his letter regarding the palm oil situation:

> Have you been moved by the argument that our subsidizing palm oil production in foreign lands helps the overseas poor? Take another look! Despite increased palm oil output in Malaysia (the world's largest producer between 1957 and 1970), the poorest fifth of rural households lost over 40% of their average incomes, while the average income of the next fifth fell 16%.

The economic situation of the poor people of the world is getting worse.

Then in regard to sugar, he said:

Subsidizing foreign sugar helps the poor in poor countries! Who's kidding whom? While world sugar prices rose, the real wage of a cane cutter in the Dominican Republic fell to less than it was 10 years earlier, not enough to buy food.

Then in regard to citrus, he said:

Yes, this costs us money and hurts our citrus industry, but it does help poor people in poor countries! Right? Wrong!

According to the Board of Science and Technology of Mexico, a country which has been a recent recipient of citrus loans, Mexico is facing "an acute crisis in supply * * * of basic food for the poor."

Then lastly, he asks the question:

Can we put restraints on subsidies that hurt our own workers and widen the gap in poor countries between rich and poor?

I agree with Mr. LONG; we cannot.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this debate with considerable interest.

What we are trying to do with foreign aid is buy a livable world for our children. We are trying to do it by helping what the famous historian Arnold Toynbee, called the external proletariat—that is the people of the undeveloped countries—raise their standard of living so they do not take the other option, which is to migrate to the developed areas, as they are, indeed, doing. So in addition to humanitarian considerations, it is a matter of plain, unquestionable self-interest.

There are presently 12 million illegal aliens in this country. When I first came to Congress, 8 years ago, there were 1 million. Ten years from now there will be 30 million, unless these people can raise their standard of living and find jobs in their own countries. If we do not want to be engulfed and have our national economy disrupted, our culture overrun, and our social structure dislocated in that way, then it is important that we try to do something to help people in the less developed countries survive.

I do not know whether this is the best way to do it, but I will say this: Until we develop a better way, we had better stick with this.

Last May, some of us had the privilege of sitting down with our former colleague Brad Morse, now in charge of the U.N. development assistance program. I think all of us were deeply impressed with the effectiveness with which funds we are contributing to that program are used.

We are surely indebted to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) for trying to strike a balance on his subcommittee. I would like to commend the entire subcommittee as well and, in particular, for the fact that it has included some really important human rights provisions. The members of the subcommittee have singled out certain countries which have serious human rights problems, and they have made some cuts in the military assistance to those countries in order to remind them that we are not just kidding when we talk about protecting basic human rights.

Last week the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) and I, along with others, attended a meeting with Mrs. Marcos, the wife of the President of the Philippines. She is a very charming, gracious, beautiful, and intelligent person. I know that some Members thought we were too blunt in speaking to Mrs. Marcos and telling her of our concerns about what is going on in the Philippines. But let me say this: When it comes to fundamental human rights, I think we do leaders of countries with whom we have close ties a real disservice if we do not convey to them the depth of our feelings and those of our people on this subject.

Mrs. Marcos was not coming to us on a social occasion. She was not coming as a guest. She invited us to meet with her in private and talk about the problems. She sat down with us as a politician, and a very able one. She is not only a member of the legislature of the Philippines but is the Governor of the city of Manila. So we talked to her, politician to politician, and I hope the frankness of our words was taken, as it was intended to be, helpful not destructive.

We must let other governments know that we do not want our military assistance used to throw people in jail for what they say and what they print. We do not like to see certain countries arresting the political opposition and putting them in prison 2 days after an election.

I think it is a mistake to think we can tell all the countries in the world how to run their internal affairs. But where we are providing financial support for a country or where we are allied with that country so that we in some sense share responsibility for some phases of its activities—for example, where we supply military assistance and the military are the people who enforce the laws, as they do in the Philippines—then I think we have an obligation to insist that our support be used in a way that does not suggest that we have a part in supporting cruelties and indignities on the people of that country.

I would just say in closing, for the benefit of some of the gentlemen who spoke on the other side of the aisle, that we have spent $194 billion since World War II on military and economic assistance to other countries. That is not much more than 1 year's defense budget. Last year all the countries of the world spent $400 billion on military and defense activities. That is more than the world spends on education. It is more than it spends on health.

About one-third of the people of the world are at or below the starvation level. Is it any wonder that we have situations of great unrest and true human tragedy all over the world?

If all those billions, indeed trillions, had been spent on basic human needs, in the last 30 years, what a different world we might be living in today. We cannot turn back the clock or recapture all that waste of resources. But certainly we can take a tiny fraction of that money and try to help alleviate some of the suffering in some of these countries, and move them to a more humane level of existence.

Mr. Chairman, I commend this bill, and I hope the Members will join me in giving it their full and wholehearted support.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JOHN T. MYERS), a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JOHN T. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening this afternoon with some interest to the discussion here upon the bill that is now before us. And time and time again I have heard it said that the programs provided for in this legislation will help poor people, will help developing nations become better partners in the world. And as I look through and see what some of these programs are, I could not help but notice the public works section, particularly from the Inter-American Development Bank, as well as IDA, the fact that there are huge sums of money in this bill that will be provided with other countries, too, to help other countries develop their water resources, irrigation, hydropower, navigation, flood control—all of the same water resource programs that we were once building in this country. The chairman, in his opening remarks, noted that our own budget from the administration this year was down 11 percent to develop our own natural water resources, yet this is up considerably this year. And I find it rather difficult to see what we are helping other countries develop their water resources, to develop their flood control, so that the farmers can produce, and we provide irrigation so that they can raise larger crops, and this is development for other countries, but when we identify and try to do the same thing for our own people in this country, to help our farmers with irrigation programs, to help our folks who live in flood plains, to avoid being flooded out every year, when we look at development of our navigation systems, and so forth, then they are pork barrels.

This administration sent out a series of letters on July 12, just this month, and one of them said we had to reexamine—which is in the process now. I understand—our water projects, making sure that we bring them up to date, as far as benefit-cost ratio. One of the Members went on to say that we had to be more realistic about the cost of money. Yet I am shocked to see here that although the interest rates vary, many of them are three-quarters of 1 percent. Do we call this a loan? Three-quarters of 1 percent, with 50 years to pay. There are others here with 1 percent with a 10-year grace period, nothing to be paid the first 10 years. Do we call these loans? Gee, I know a lot of communities out there which are trying to build water systems, sewage systems, irrigation systems, but these are projects that those communities would love to get for three-quarters of 1 percent.

I do not think anybody in this country would have nerve enough to call that a loan.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHN T. MYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman making this point at this time. I thought the gentleman might like to know, and that the rest of our colleagues might like to know, that tomorrow is August 1, 1978, and tomorrow the World Bank will take up and consider the first of five loans for Vietnam, soft loans, three-quarters of 1 percent administrative cost, no interest, and 50 years in which to repay.

The first loan is for $60 million and is for irrigation and water-management projects on the Saigon River.

Mr. JOHN T. MYERS. That is another area where, again, we are doing more for our former enemy than we are doing for our own people in this country.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHN T. MYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG) if there is any action whatsoever that this Congress can take, any action whatsoever, which can prevent that loan.

Will killing this entire bill prevent that loan?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHN T. MYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I would like to respond to the gentleman, and I am not suggesting killing the bill.

Mr. OBEY. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman answer the specific question.

The answer to that question is "no," is it not?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, the answer to the gentleman is simply no because the loan is going to be made tomorrow.

Mr. OBEY. If the loan were to be made a year from now, could it be stopped? The answer is "no," is it not?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. The answer is "no" as of today, for this particular loan.

If the gentleman will let me finish the answer, the answer is no, we cannot stop this loan tomorrow. Next year and the year after perhaps there are four more which are in the process of being made.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) that we can prevent the use of American money to make those loans. That is not as difficult as the gentleman will try to make it appear. When we get to that point during the amendment procedure the money can be deleted; but yes, the answer is that we can stop American moneys from going into that loan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JOHN T. MYERS) has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JOHN T. MYERS).

Mr. JOHN T. MYERS. To continue, Mr. Chairman, what we have been doing here—and I have been noting it—is that we have been contributing 28 percent to IDA and then we contribute to the Inter-American Development Bank 36 percent, and then there are some funds for special operations, to which we are contributing 55 percent.

It seems to me that what I was trying to say here is that I am not sure, but I think perhaps some of these loans are good.

Earlier in the authorization we talked about the dual concept we have here. We use a different type of yardstick with certain nations, but we are not consistent. Why is it that these are good programs for this administration to propose in the budget for other countries, but the identical types of programs in this country are bad in that they cost too much, and some even go so far as to call them "pork-barrel"?

If they are good for other countries—and I happen to believe that many of these programs are good—why are we not doing more for ourselves? Why is it that we are contributing 55 percent to do things for other nations while we are not willing to help ourselves?

Mr. Chairman, I think our God-given water resources are a tremendous asset to preserve, and we need to keep them and to develop them. Why is it other nations which enter into programs like this are not willing to help themselves? I do not think we can throw our hands up and say, "Here is the money. Spend it as you like."

I think that is just exactly what the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG) has identified as not being the way in which the American taxpayers want their money to be spent, through the World Bank or anything else. They are not interested in seeing their hard-earned tax dollars spent in this way.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. VOLKMER) having assumed the chair, Mr. KAZEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 12931) making appropriations for foreign assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill H.R. 12931, just under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

ENHANCING OUTDOOR RECREATION OPPORTUNITIES FOR PEOPLE OF UNITED STATES

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 8336) to enhance the outdoor recreation opportunities for the people of the United States by expanding the National Park System, by providing access to and within areas of the National Park System, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments with an amendment to the text of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

TITLE I

Sec. 101. The Congress finds the natural, scenic, recreation, historic, and other values of a forty-eight-mile segment of the Chattahoochee River and certain adjoining lands in the State of Georgia from Buford Dam downstream to Peachtree Creek are of special national significance, and that such values should be preserved and protected from developments and uses which would substantially impair or destroy them. In order to assure such preservation and protection for public benefit and enjoyment, there is hereby established the Chattahoochee River National Recreation Area (hereinafter referred to as the "recreation area"). The recreation area shall consist of the river and its bed together with the lands, waters and interests therein within the boundary generally depicted on the map entitled "Chattahoochee River National Recreation Area," numbered CHAT-20,000, and dated July 1976, which shall be on file and available for public inspection in the office of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") may make minor revisions in the boundary of the recreation area to delete tracts that would involve significant severance damages to remaining lands, to delete lands having valuable improvements that would be of little or no benefit to the recreation area, to encompass severed lands and to accommodate technical and operational considerations, except that the total area within the recreation area, exclusive of the river and its bed may not exceed six thousand three hundred acres.

Sec. 102. (a) Within the recreation area the Secretary is authorized to acquire lands, waters, and interests therein by donation, purchase, with donated or appropriated funds, or exchange. Property owned by the State of Georgia or any political subdivision thereof may be acquired only by donation. The Secretary may refrain from purchase of tracts of land or portions thereof used or to be used for other than noncommercial residential purposes if the owner shall, within one year of the date of enactment of this Act, enter into an agreement with the Secretary assuring that such property shall be used under such terms and conditions as the Secretary, in his discretion, may prescribe for the preservation and protection of the recreation area.

(b) Except for property which the Secretary determines to be necessary for the purposes of administration, development, access, or public use, an owner of improved property which is used solely for noncommercial residential purposes on the date of its acquisition by the Secretary may retain, as a condition of such acquisition, a right of use and occupancy of the property for such agricultural or residential purposes. The right retained may be for a definite term which shall not exceed twenty-five years or, in lieu thereof, for a term ending at the death of the owner or the death of the spouse, whichever occurs later. The owner shall elect the term to be retained. The Secretary shall pay the owner the fair market value of the property on the date of such acquisition less the fair market value of the term retained by the owner.

(c) Any right of use and occupancy retained pursuant to this section may, during its existence, be conveyed or transferred, but all rights of use and occupancy shall be subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary deems appropriate to assure the use of the property in accordance with the purposes of this Act. Upon his determination that the property, or any portion thereof, has ceased to be so used in accordance with such terms and conditions, the Secretary may terminate the right of use and occupancy by tendering to the holder of such right an amount equal to the fair market value, as of the date of the tender, of that portion of the right which remains unexpired on the date of termination.

(d) As used in this section the term "improved property" means a detached, year-around noncommercial residential dwelling the construction of which was begun before January 1, 1975, together with so much of the land on which the dwelling is situated, the said land being in the same ownership as the dwelling, as the Secretary shall designate to be reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of the dwelling for the sole purpose of noncommercial residential use, together with any structures accessory to the dwelling which are situated on the land so designated.

SEC. 103 (a) The Secretary shall administer, protect, and develop the recreation area in accordance with the Act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535), and in accordance with any other statutory authorities available to him for the conservation and management of historic and natural resources, including fish and wildlife, to the extent he finds such authority will further the purposes of this Act. In developing and administering the recreation area the Secretary shall take into consideration applicable Federal, State, and local recreation plans and resource use and development plans, including, but not limited to, the Atlanta Regional Commission Chattahoochee Corridor Study, dated July 1972.

(b) The Secretary is authorized and encouraged to enter into cooperative agreements with the State or its political subdivisions whereby he may assist in the planning for and interpretation of non-Federal publicly owned lands within or adjacent or related to the recreation area to assure that such lands are used in a manner consistent with the findings and purposes of this Act.

(c) In planning for the development and public use of the recreation area, the Secretary shall consult with the Secretary of the Army to assure that public use of adjacent or related water resource development or flood control projects and that of the recreation area are complementary.

(d) In administering the recreation area the Secretary shall permit hunting and fishing on lands and waters under his jurisdiction in accordance with applicable State and Federal laws, except that he may designate zones where, and establish periods when, no hunting or fishing shall be permitted for reasons of public safety, administration, or public use and enjoyment and issue such regulations as he may determine to be necessary to carry out the provisions of this subsection. Except in emergencies, any rules and regulations of the Secretary pursuant to this subsection, shall be put into effect only after consultation with the appropriate State agency.

SEC. 104. (a) The Federal Power Commission shall not license the construction of any dam, water conduit, reservoir, powerhouse, transmission line, or other project works under the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 791a et seq.), on or directly affecting the recreation area and no department or agency of the United States shall assist by loan, grant, license, or otherwise in the construction of any water resources project that would have a direct and adverse effect on the values for which such area is established, except where such project is determined by the State of Georgia to be necessary for water supply or water quality enhancement purposes and authorized by the United States Congress. Nothing contained in the foregoing sentence, however, shall preclude licensing of, or assistance to, developments upstream or downstream from the recreation area or on any stream tributary thereto which will not invade the recreation area or unreasonably diminish the scenic, recreational, and fish and wildlife values present therein on the date of approval of this Act. Nothing contained in this subsection shall preclude the upgrading, improvement, expansion or development of facilities or public works for water supply or water quality enhancement purposes if such action would not have a material adverse effect on the values for which the recreation area is established.

(b) No department or agency of the United States shall recommend authorization of any water resources project that would have a direct and adverse effect on the values for which such area is established, as determined by the Secretary, or shall such department or agency request appropriations to begin construction of any such project, whether heretofore or hereafter authorized, without at least sixty days in advance, (a) advising the Secretary in writing of its intention to do and (b) reporting to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives and to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate the nature of the project involved and the manner in which such project would conflict with the purposes of this Act or would affect the recreation area and the values to be protected by it under this Act.

(c) Nothing in this Act shall be construed in any way to require the manipulation or reduction of the lake water levels in Lake Sidney Lanier or to restrict, prohibit or affect any recommendation of the Metropolitan Atlanta Water Resources Study as authorized by the Public Works Committee of the United States Senate on March 2, 1972.

SEC. 105. (a) There is hereby established the Chattahoochee River National Recreation Area Advisory Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission") which shall be composed of nine members to be appointed by the Secretary for terms of five (5) years as follows:

(1) Six members to be appointed from recommendations submitted by the Governor of the State of Georgia, two of which shall be residents of the Chattahoochee River Corridor Area, and two of which shall be from the membership of Georgia conservation groups;

(2) One member to be appointed from a recommendation submitted by the Secretary of the Army; and

(3) Two members to be appointed from recommendations submitted by the Atlanta Regional Commission.

(b) The Commission shall terminate ten years from the date of establishment of the recreation area.

(c) A vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment (and for the balance of the unexpired term). The Chairman of the Commission shall be designated by the Secretary.

(d) The Commission shall act and advise by affirmative vote of a majority of its members.

(e) The Secretary or his designee shall from time to time, but at least semiannually, consult with the Commission with respect to matters relating to the development of the recreation area.

(f) Members of the Commission shall serve without compensation as such. The Secretary is authorized to pay the expenses reasonably incurred by the Commission in carrying out its responsibilities under this Act upon presentation of vouchers signed by the Chairman.

SEC. 106. (a) The Secretary may not expend more than $72,900,000 from the Land and Water Conservation Fund for land acquisition nor more than $500,000 for the development of essential facilities: Provided, That no funds for the development of essential facilities shall be authorized prior to October 1, 1978.

Within three years from the effective date of this Act, the Secretary shall, after consulting with the Governor of the State of Georgia, develop and transmit to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives and to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States a general management plan for the use and development of the recreation area consistent with the findings and purposes of this Act, indicating:

(1) lands and interests in lands adjacent or related to the recreation area which are deemed necessary or desirable for the purposes of resource protection, scenic integrity, or management and administration of the area in furtherance of the purposes of this Act, the estimated cost of acquisition, and the recommended public acquisition agency;

(2) the number of visitors and types of public use within the recreation area that can be accommodated in accordance with the full protection of its resources; and

(3) the facilities deemed necessary to accommodate and provide access for such visitors and uses, including their location and estimated cost.

TITLE II

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 201. (a) The Congress hereby finds that—

(1) the purpose of the national park system is to preserve outstanding natural, scenic, historic, and recreation areas for the enjoyment, education, inspiration, and use of all people;

(2) units of the national park system have recently been established near major metropolitan areas in order to preserve remaining open space and to provide recreational opportunities for urban residents (many of whom do not have access to personal motor vehicles); and

(3) circumstances which necessarily require people desiring to visit units of the national park system to rely on personal motor vehicles may diminish the natural and recreational value of such units by causing traffic congestion and environmental damage, and by requiring roads, parking, and other facilities in ever-increasing numbers and density.

(b) The purpose of this Act is to make the national park system more accessible in a manner consistent with the preservation of parks and the conservation of energy by encouraging the use of transportation modes other than personal motor vehicles for access to units of the national park system with minimum disruption to nearby communities through authorization of a pilot transportation program.

SEC. 202. (a) The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as "Secretary") is authorized to formulate transportation plans and implement transportation projects where feasible pursuant to those plans for units of the national park system.

(b) To carry out the purposes of subsection (a) of this section, the Secretary is authorized to—

(1) contract with public or private agencies or carriers to provide transportation services, capital equipment, or facilities to improve access to units of the national park system;

(2) operate such services directly in the absence of suitable and adequate agencies or carriers;

(3) acquire by purchase, lease, or agreement, capital equipment for such services; and

(4) where necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act, acquire by lease, purchase, donation, exchange, or transfer, lands, waters, and interests therein which are situated outside the boundary of a unit of the national park system, which property shall be administered as part of the unit: Provided, That any land or interest in land owned by a State or any of its political subdivisions may be acquired only by donation: Provided further, That any land acquisition shall be subject to such statutory limitations, if any, on methods of acquisition and appropriations thereof as may be specifically applicable to such area.

(c) Acquisitions pursuant to subsection (b) (3) and (4) shall become final within sixty days (not counting days on which the Senate or the House of Representatives has adjourned for more than three consecutive days) from the time the Secretary has submitted a detailed proposal for such acquisitions to the Committee on Energy and National Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives in the absence of a concurrent resolution of objection.

(d) All fees collected in the operation of the facilities and services authorized by this Act shall be covered into the Planning, Development, and Operation of Recreation Facilities appropriation account to be subject to appropriation.

(e) The Secretary shall establish information programs to inform the public of available park access opportunities and to promote the use of transportation modes other than personal motor vehicles for access to and travel within the unit of the national park system.

(f) Transportation facilities and services provided pursuant to this Act shall not be considered as concession facilities or services within the meaning of the Act of October 9, 1965 (79 Stat. 969) and may be undertaken by the Secretary directly or by contract without regard to any requirement of local, State, or Federal law respecting determinations of public convenience and necessity or other similar matters: Provided, That the Secretary or his contractor shall consult with the appropriate State or local public service commission or other such body having authority to issue certificates fo convenience and necessity, and any such contractor shall be subject to applicable requirements of such body unless the Secretary determines that such requirements would not be consistent with the purposes and provisions of the Act.

(g) No grant of authority in this Act shall be deemed to expand the exemption of section 203(b)(4) of the Interstate Commerce Act (49 U.S.C. 303(b)(4)).

SEC. 203. (a) To carry out the purposes of this Act, the Secretary of Transportation, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Secretary of Commerce, and the heads of such other Federal departments or agencies as the Secretary deems necessary are directed to assist the Secretary in the formulation and implementation of transportation projects.

(b) Within one hundred and eighty days from the enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall prepare and submit to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, a compilation of Federal statutes and programs providing authority for the planning, funding, or operation of transportation projects which might be utilized by the Secretary to carry out the purpose of this Act. The Secretary shall revise the compilation thereafter as he deems necessary.

SEC. 204. (a) The Secretary shall, during the formulation of any transportation plan authorized pursuant to section 2 of this Act—

(1) give public notice of intention to formulate such a plan by publication in the Federal Register and in a newspaper or periodical having general circulation in the vicinity of the affected unit of the national park system;

(2) following such notice hold a public meeting at a location or locations convenient to the affected unit of the national park system.

(b) Prior to the implementation of any project developed pursuant to the transportation plan formulated pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, the Secretary shall—

(1) establish procedures, including but not limited to public meetings, to give State and local governments and the public adequate notice and an opportunity to comment on the proposed transportation project; and

(2) submit, when the proposed project would involve an expenditure in excess of $100,000 in any fiscal year, a detailed report to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives. The Secretary shall proceed with the implementation of such plan after sixty days (not counting days on which the Senate or House of Representatives has adjourned for more than three consecutive days) in the absence of a concurrent resolution of objection.

SEC. 205. The Secretary shall submit a report to the Congress, within three years of the effective date of this Act. The report shall include, but not be limited to, his findings and recommendations regarding—

(a) preservation of natural resource values within units of the national park system through access alternatives;

(b) effects of the projects on communities in close proximity to the units of the national park system; and

(c) future transportation projects formulated pursuant to this Act.

SEC. 206. In carrying out the purposes of this Act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated $1,000,000 for fiscal year 1979; $2,000,000 for fiscal year 1980; and $3,000,000 for fiscal year 1981, which shall remain available until expended.

TITLE III

SEC. 301. Section 4 of the Act approved August 31, 1965 (79 Stat. 588), as amended, providing for the commemoration of certain historical events in the State of Kansas, is further amended by changing $2,000,000." to "$2,750,000.".

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to authorize the establishment of the Chattahoochee River National Recreation Area in the State of Georgia, and for other purposes.".

The Clerk read the House amendment to the text of the Senate amendments, as follows:

Strike all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof:

TITLE I

SEC. 101. The Congress finds the natural, scenic, recreation, historic, and other values of a forty-eight-mile segment of the Chattahoochee River and certain adjoining lands in the State of Georgia from Buford Dam downstream to Peachtree Creek are of special national significance, and that such values should be preserved and protected from developments and uses which would substantially impair or destroy them. In order to assure such preservation and protection for public benefit and enjoyment, there is hereby established the Chattahoochee River National Recreation Area (hereinafter referred to as the "recreation area"). The recreation area shall consist of the river and its bed together with the lands, waters, and interests therein within the boundary generally depicted on the map entitled "Chattahoochee River National Recreation Area", numbered CHAT–20,000, and dated July 1976, which shall be on file and available for public inspection in the office of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior. Following reasonable notice in writing to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatves and to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate of his intention to do so, the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") may, by publication of a revised map or other boundary description in the Federal Register, (1) make minor revisions in the boundary of the recreation area, and (2) revise the boundary to facilitate access to the recreation area, or to delete lands which would be of little or no benefit to the recreation area due to the existence of valuable improvements completely constructed prior to the date of enactment of this Act. The total area, exclusive of the river and its bed, within the recreation area may not exceed six thousand three hundred acres.

SEC. 102. (a) Within the recreation area the Secretary is authorized to acquire lands, waters, and interests therein by donation, purchase with donated or appropriated funds, or exchange. Property owned by the State of Georgia or any political subdivision thereof may be acquired only by donation.

(b) When a tract of land lies partly within and partly without the boundaries of the recreation area, the Secretary may acquire the entire tract by any of the above methods in order to avoid the payment of severance costs. Land so acquired outside of the boundaries of the recreation area may be exchanged by the Secretary for non-Federal land within such boundaries, and any portion of the land not utilized for such exchanges may be disposed of in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 471 et seq.).

(c) Except for property which the Secretary determines to be necessary for the purposes of administration, development, access, or public use, an owner of improved property which is used solely for noncommercial residential purposes on the date of its acquisition by the Secretary may retain, as a condition of such acquisition, a right of use and occupancy of the property for such residential purposes. The right retained may be for a definite term which shall not exceed twenty-five years or, in lieu thereof, for a term ending at the death of the owner or the death of the spouse, whichever occurs later. The owner shall elect the term to be retained. The Secretary shall pay the owner the fair market value of the property on the date of such acquisition, less the fair market value of the term retained by the owner.

(d) Any right of use and occupancy retained pursuant to this section may, during its existence, be conveyed or transferred, but all rights of use and occupancy shall be subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary deems appropriate to assure the use of the property in accordance with the purposes of this Act. Upon his determination that the property, or any portion thereof, has ceased to be so used in accordance with such terms and conditions, the Secretary may terminate the right of use and occupancy by tendering to the holder of such right an amount equal to the fair market value, as of the date of the tender, of that portion of the right which remains unexpired on the date of termination.

(e) As used in this section, the term "improved property" means a detached, year-round noncommercial residential dwelling, the construction of which was begun before January 1, 1975, together with so much of the land on which the dwelling is situated, the said land being in the same ownership as the dwelling, as the Secretary shall designate to be reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of the dwelling for the sole purpose of noncommercial residential use; together with any structures accessory to the dwelling which are situated on the land so designated.

SEC. 103. (a) The Secretary shall administer, protect, and develop the recreation area in accordance with the Act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535); and in accordance with any other statutory authorities available to him for the conservation and management of historic and natural resources, including fish and wildlife, to the extent he finds such authority will further the purposes of this Act. In developing and administering the recreation area, the Secretary shall take into consideration applicable Federal, State, and local recreation plans and resource use and development plans, including, but not limited to, the Atlanta Regional Commission Chattahoochee Corridor Study, dated July 1972.

(b) The Secretary is authorized and encouraged to enter into cooperative agreements with the State or its political subdivisions whereby he may assist in the planning for and interpretation of non-Federal publicly owned lands within or adjacent or related to the recreation area to assure that such lands are used in a manner consistent with the findings and purposes of this Act.

(c) In planning for the development and public use of the recreation area, the Secretary shall consult with the Secretary of the Army to assure that public use of adjacent or related water resource development or flood control projects and that of the recreation area are complementary.

(d) In administering the recreation area, the Secretary may permit fishing in waters under his jurisdiction in accordance with applicable State and Federal laws and regulations. The Secretary, after consultation with the appropriate State agency responsible for fishing activities, may designate zones where, and establish periods when, fishing shall be permitted and issue such regulations as he may determine to be necessary to carry out the provisions of this subsection. Except in emergencies, such regulations shall be put into effect only after consultation with the appropriate State agency.

SEC. 104. (a) The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission shall not license the construction of any dam, water conduit, reservoir, powerhouse, transmission line, or other project works under the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 791a et seq.), on or directly affecting the recreation area, and no department or agency of the United States shall assist by loan, grant, license, or otherwise in the construction of any water resources project that would have a direct and adverse effect on the values for which such area is established, except where such project is determined by the State of Georgia to be necessary for water supply or water quality enhancement purposes and authorized by the United States Congress. Nothing contained in the foregoing sentence, however, shall preclude licensing of, or assistance to, developments upstream or downstream from the recreation area or on any stream tributary thereto which will not invade the recreation area or unreasonably diminish the scenic, recreational, and fish and wildlife values present therein on the date of approval of this Act. Nothing contained in this subsection shall preclude the upgrading, improvement, expansion or development of facilities or public works for water supply or water quality enhancement purposes if such action would not have a material adverse effect on the values for which the recreation area is established.

(b) No department or agency of the United States shall recommend authorization of any water resources project that would have a direct and adverse effect on the values for which such area is established, as determined by the Secretary, nor shall such department or agency request appropriations to begin construction of any such project, whether heretofore or hereafter authorized, without at least sixty days in advance, (1) advising the Secretary in writing of its intention to do so and (2) reporting to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives and to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate the nature of the project involved and the manner in which such project would conflict with the purposes of this Act or would affect the recreation area and the values to be protected by it under this Act. It is not the intention of Congress by this Act to require the manipulation or reduction of lake water levels in Lake Sidney Lanier. Nothing in this Act shall be construed in any way to restrict, prohibit, or affect any recommendation of the Metropolitan Atlanta Water Resources Study as authorized by the Public Works Committee of the United States Senate on March 2, 1972.

(c) The Secretary is directed to proceed as expeditiously as possible to acquire the lands and interests in lands necessary to achieve the purposes of this Act.

SEC. 105. (a) From the appropriations authorized for fiscal year 1978 and succeeding fiscal years pursuant to the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act (78 Stat. 897), as amended, not more than $72,900,000 may be expended for the acquisition of lands and interests in lands authorized to be acquired pursuant to the provisions of this Act.

(b) Effective on October 1, 1978, there are authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $500,000 for the development of essential public facilities.

(c) Within three years from the effective date of this Act, the Secretary shall, after consulting with the Governor of the State of Georgia, develop and transmit to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives and to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate a general management plan for the use and development of the recreation area consistent with the findings and purposes of this Act, indicating:

(1) lands and interests in lands adjacent or related to the recreation area which are deemed necessary or desirable for the purposes of resource protection, scenic integrity, or management and administration of the area in furtherance of the purposes of this Act, the estimated cost of acquisition, and the recommended public acquisition agency;

(2) the number of visitors and types of public use within the recreation area that can be accommodated in accordance with the full protection of its resources; and

(3) the facilities deemed necessary to accommodate and provide access for such visitors and uses, including their location and estimated cost.

TITLE II

SEC. 201. Section 4 of the Act approved August 31, 1965 (79 Stat. 588), as amended, providing for the commemoration of certain historical events in the State of Kansas, is further amended by changing "$2,000,000." to "$2,750,000."; Provided, That such increase shall be effective on October 1, 1978.

TITLE III

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 301. (a) The Congress hereby finds that—

(1) the purpose of the national park system is to preserve outstanding natural, scenic, historic, and recreation areas for the enjoyment, education, inspiration, and use of all people;

(2) units of the national park system have recently been established near major metropolitan areas in order to preserve remaining open space and to provide recreational opportunities for urban residents (many of whom do not have access to personal motor vehicles); and

(3) circumstances which necessarily require people desiring to visit units of the national park system to rely on personal motor vehicles may diminish the natural and recreational value of such units by causing traffic congestion and environmental damage, and by requiring the provision of roads, parking, and other facilities in ever-increasing numbers and density.

(b) The purpose of this title is to make the national park system more accessible in a manner consistent with the preservation of parks and the conservation of energy by encouraging the use of transportation modes other than personal motor vehicles for access to and within units of the national park system with minimum disruption to nearby communities through authorization of a pilot transportation program.

SEC. 302. (a) The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as "Secretary") is authorized to formulate transportation plans and implement transportation projects where feasible pursuant to those plans for units of the national park system.

(b) To carry out the purposes of subsection (a) of this section, the Secretary is authorized to—

(1) contract with public or private agencies or carriers to provide transportation services, capital equipment, or facilities to improve access to units of the national park system;

(2) operate such services directly in the absence of suitable and adequate agencies or carriers;

(3) acquire by purchase, lease, or agreement, capital equipment for such services; and

(4) where necessary to carry out the purposes of this title, acquire by lease, purchase, donation, exchange, or transfer, lands, waters, and interests therein which are situated outside the boundary of a unit of the national park system, which probably shall be administered as part of the unit: Provided, That any land or interests in land owned by a State or any of its political subdivisions may be acquired only by donation: Provided further, That any land acquisition shall be subject to such statutory limitations, if any, on methods of acquisition and appropriations thereof as may be specifically applicable to such area.

(c) Acquisitions pursuant to subsection (b) (3) and (4) of this section shall not commence prior to sixty days (not counting days on which the Senate or the House of Representatives has adjourned for more than three consecutive days) from the time the Secretary has submitted a detailed proposal for such acquisitions to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives.

(d) All fees directly collected by the National Park Service in the operation of the facilities and services authorized by this title shall be covered into the Planning, Development, and Operation of Recreation Facilities appropriation account to be subject to appropriation.

(e) The Secretary shall establish information programs to inform the public of available park access opportunities and to promote the use of transportation modes other than personal motor vehicles for access to and travel within the units of the national park system.

(f) Transportation facilities and services provided pursuant to this title shall not be considered as concession facilities or services within the meaning of the Act of October 9, 1965 (78 Stat. 969) and may be undertaken by the Secretary directly or by contract without regard to any requirement of local, State, or Federal law respecting determinations of public convenience and necessity or other similar matters: Provided, That the Secretary or his contractor shall consult with the appropriate State or local public service commission or other such body having authority to issue certificates of convenience and necessity, and any such contractor shall be subject to applicable requirements of such body unless the Secretary determines that such requirements would not be consistent with the purposes and provisions of this title.

(g) No grant of authority in this title shall be deemed to expand the exemption of section 203(b)(4) of the Interstate Commerce Act (49 U.S.C. 303(b)(4)).

SEC. 303. (a) To carry out the purposes of this title, the Secretary of Transportation, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Secretary of Commerce, and the heads of such other Federal departments or agencies as the Secretary deems necessary are directed to assist the Secretary in the formulation and implementation of transportation projects.

(b) Within one hundred and eighty days from the enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall prepare and submit to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, a compilation of Federal statutes and programs providing authority for the planning, funding, or operation of transportation projects which might be utilized by the Secretary to carry out the purpose of this title. The Secretary shall revise the compilation thereafter as he deems necessary.

SEC. 304. (a) The Secretary shall, during the formulation of any transportation plan authorized pursuant to section 302 of this title—

(1) give public notice of intention to formulate such a plan by publication in the Federal Register and in a newspaper or periodical having general circulation in the vicinity of the affected unit of the national park system;

(2) following such notice hold a public meeting at a location or locations convenient to the affected unit of the national park system.

(b) Prior to the implementation of any project developed pursuant to the transportation plan formulated pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, the Secretary shall—

(1) establish procedures, including but not limited to public meetings, to give State and local governments and the public adequate notice and an opportunity to comment on the proposed transportation project; and

(2) submit, when the proposed project would involve an expenditure in excess of $100,000 in any fiscal year, a detailed report to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives. The Secretary may proceed with the implementation of such plan only after sixty days (not counting days on which the Senate or House of Representatives has adjourned for more than three consecutive days) have elapsed following submission of the plan.

SEC. 305. The Secretary shall submit a report to the Congress within three years of the effective date of this Act. The report shall include, but not be limited to, his findings and recommendations regarding—

(a) preservation of natural resources values within units of the national park system through access alternatives;

(b) effects of transportation projects on communities in close proximity to the units of the national park system; and

(c) future transportation projects formulated pursuant to this title.

SEC. 306. In carrying out the purposes of this title, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated $1,000,000 for fiscal year 1979; $2,000,000 for fiscal year 1980; and $3,000,000 for fiscal year 1981, which shall remain available until expended. In a fiscal year when the amounts actually appropriated are less than the amounts listed above, the authorized but unappropriated amount shall continue to be available for appropriation in succeeding fiscal years.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, but I would like to ask the gentleman from California if he could explain to us what this bill does and what the Senate amendment is.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the amendment we are sending back to the Senate is, in effect and in all particulars, the same, with minor exceptions. We are accepting a reduction of $100,000 in the bill. We are accepting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SKUBITZ) with reference to Fort Scott. We are accepting the Senate amendment, the access bill, which is S. 975, access to the national parks.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Has the chairman consulted with the ranking minority member of the committee?

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. That is correct.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. And the ranking minority member has no objection?

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. That is correct.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) to dispense with further reading of the amendments?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the first request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

ON THE RETIREMENT OF A GREAT NAVAL LEADER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SIKES) is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, on August 1, Adm. Frederick H. Michaelis, U.S Navy, the Chief of Naval Material, will retire from active duty after 38 years of active service. I should like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the splendid record of service and achievement of this great American naval officer, and in honoring Admiral Michaelis, to also honor that generation of American fighting men and women who were his comrades-in-arms through nearly four decades of war and peace.

Admiral Michaelis, a native of Missouri, is one of the few remaining officers of flag rank whose service began before the United States entered World War II. He witnessed the beginning of the war from the deck of the battleship U.S.S. Pennsylvania, which was at Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, the day of the Japanese attack on American sea, land, and air forces.

During World War II Admiral Michaelis served bravely and skillfully as a fighter pilot in the Pacific, shooting down five enemy aircraft, and commanding both fighter and fighter-bombing squadrons. For his extraordinary heroism and fearlessness in combat, he was awarded the Navy Cross, the Silver Star, and the Air Medal.

Following World War II Admiral Michaelis served in a number of vital assignments in air development and in special weapons, helping develop the aircraft, weapons, and tactics that enabled the U.S. Navy to forge a new era in weaponry and ship propulsion.

He was the second commanding officer of the world's first atomic-powered aircraft carrier, U.S.S. Enterprise, an assignment he handled with distinction. He also was given a number of sensitive staff positions in Washington and in seagoing commands, including command of Carrier Division Nine in the Gulf of Tonkin during the Vietnam war.

As a vice admiral, he was Deputy Director, Joint Strategic Target Planning Staff, Offutt Air Force Base, and from 1972 to 1975, was Commander, Naval Air Force, U.S. Atlantic Fleet.

Since April 1975, Admiral Michaelis has handled one of the largest and most diverse commands in the Navy, the Naval Material Command. In this position of great responsibility as commander of an organization of more than 210,000 military and civilian personnel and an annual budget exceeding $20 billion, Admiral Michaelis consistently displayed unparalleled qualities of leadership, professional skill, vision, and force.

Under Admiral Michaelis, the Naval Material Command substantially improved its ability to acquire naval systems and equipment and to support them in the fleet.

Through formation of a Navy Claims Settlement Board and other actions, he made significant progress in resolution of residual shipbuilding claims that masked the Navy's real management capability in acquiring new ships and submarines and seriously damaged the Navy's relationship with its shipbuilders, the Congress, and other parts of the Federal Government.

His contributions to the effectiveness of his command and to the present and future readiness of naval forces stand in the highest traditions of the naval service.

Mr. Speaker, I believe you will share my pride in the fact that Adm. Frederick H. Michaelis has served his country and the U.S. Navy with uncommon skill and devotion and I know you and our colleagues will join me in wishing him and his family well in his retirement and in the years ahead.●

AN EXPLANATION OF THE BROYHILL AMENDMENT TO THE ADMINISTRATION'S HOSPITAL COST CONTAINMENT BILL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, on July 21, 1978, the Washington Post published an editorial with reference to the House Commerce Committee's action on the administration's hospital cost containment bill, H.R. 6575. As many of my colleagues are aware, I successfully offered an amendment to the bill which removed the onerous, Federal revenue control limit from the bill. The motivation behind my amendment was simply to find some common ground of agreement by the committee to support a reasonable and meaningful measure, much unlike the administration's bill.

My amendment was adopted by a vote of 22 to 21. Following the vote, the Post criticized the committee's action stating that the committee would rather not arrive at a decision about the problem of rising hospital costs. Indeed, the committee did arrive at a decision on the administration's bill. It considered the merits of the bill and found it to be lacking. Consequently, the committee decided to reject that proposal and adopt a more rational approach which I offered.

Regretfully, the Post editorial made no reference to the fact that the legislation was reported out of committee by a vote of 15 to 12. Accordingly, in an effort to present the other side of the issue, I responded to the Post editorial which has yet to be published. I am submitting the text of my letter into the RECORD which I trust will be of interest to my colleagues.

In addition, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a brief legislative history, which I prepared, on the events surrounding the cost containment issue. This summary also contains an outline of my amendment adopted by the Commerce Committee.

The articles follow:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 24, 1978.

PHILIP GEYELIN,

DEAR MR. GEYELIN: As the sponsor of the amendment to the Administration's hospital cost containment bill, H.R. 6575, recently adopted by the House Commerce Committee, I must take strong exception to your editorial of July 21, 1978.

The Commerce Committee's approval of my amendment, thereby rejecting the Administration's proposal, was not a decision to abandon attempts at solving the problem of rising hospital costs. In fact, those Committee Members who supported the Broyhill amendment did so with a firm understanding of the issue and, accordingly, acted responsibly to support a rational approach to addressing the problem.

My compromise amendment would establish a National Commission to monitor the efforts of the hospital industry to control costs voluntarily. Further, the amendment authorizes the Commission to provide Congress with a comprehensive analysis of the problem and submit recommendations to the President on alternative, permanent reforms to address hospital costs. Additionally, the amendment provides Federal assistance to states to encourage them to develop their own cost containment programs as well as payments to hospitals to consolidate or discontinue existing services shown to be in excess.

Indeed, the Commerce Committee has not disregarded the issue of health care costs. This same Committee has reported to the House comprehensive and meaningful legislation designed to address this problem. The Health Planning and Resources Development Act, Health Maintenance Organization legislation and Professional Standards Review Organization legislation are just a few of many programs which, in part, have as their goal quality health care at reasonable costs. What we should be doing is to improve upon existing programs rather than create another, new layer of Federal bureaucracy which, in itself, is costly.

As you accurately stated, though, the Commerce Committee does recognize that hospital costs are intolerably high. The data are persuasive and compelling. But to describe H.R. 6575, as has the Administration, as the major legislative proposal to control inflation is, to borrow a word recently used by HEW Secretary Joseph Califano, an "affront" to the American people. This bill would not have controlled inflation. If the Administration is truly committed to fighting inflation, it should approach the problem with a wider perspective befitting an issue of such magnitude.

Unfortunately, the Administration's bill was nothing more than a short-sighted, stopgap solution to a very complex problem. This was obvious the moment the bill was introduced on April 25, 1977, and has since been the reason why H.R. 6575 has been in serious trouble. The fact that the Committee spent almost seven weeks in markup sessions is testimony that H.R. 6575 was simply not a workable solution.

As presented to the Committee, H.R. 6575 proposed to place a limit of one and a half times the GNP deflator (9%) on the rate of increase in hospital revenues over a designated base year, and limit capital expenditures to $3 billion. Then, at the end of five years, the estimated cost savings to Americans would be $30 billion or $56 billion or $28 billion, depending on whom you asked in the Administration.

Implementing H.R. 6575 would have been an administrative nightmare. Under the numerous exception, exemption and review processes proposed by the bill, Secretary Califano would have become the "super hospital administrator" of America. One of the hallmarks of the Carter Administration has been to return decision making authority back to localities. This bill would have had absolutely an opposite effect.

Additionally, the practical effect of the bill would have been a reduction in health services. Small hospitals in rural areas, which have tended to practice economy measures, would have been especially hard hit. For them, a reduction or discontinuance of health services would have been a likely result. As a consequence, the community would have suffered. Such an outcome may cut costs, but the health and well-being of millions of Americans would be jeopardized. In my opinion, such an outcome is unacceptable. I venture to say that most Americans would agree.

Regarding the Voluntary Effort, organized by the health community, I believe that this program should be given a chance to work without the threat of a fallback Federal mandatory control program. The President himself asked industry to voluntarily control costs. I am aware of no other industry which has met the Administration's challenge as has the hospital industry. Why then the later contradiction exemplified in H.R. 6575?

Recent April data are encouraging: total hospital expenditures were 3.8 percentage points lower than the rate of increase for 1977. I might add that the Congressional Budget Office has estimated the savings obtained from the Voluntary Effort to be $30 billion over the next five years.

It seems to me we should encourage the industry to further its progress. The adoption of my amendment is an effort to foster such a goal. Should the Voluntary Effort fail, then as provided by my amendment, recommendations are to be made to Congress within 60 days of such a determination on an interim program designed to address the problem while long-term recommendations are developed for permanent reform.

Unquestionably this was a difficult decision for most Members on the Committee. It is hard to oppose legislation which has an appealing title. Upon close examination, though, it was clear the merits of H.R. 6575 were in serious question. The debate has been fruitful and informative. I am hopeful that the adoption of my amendment will serve notice to the Administration that Members of Congress will respond to the problem of rising health care costs, but only when presented with a rational, equitable, and workable approach to the problem.

JAMES T. BROYHILL,

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

The Administration's Hospital Cost Containment Act of 1977 was introduced as H.R. 6575 by Congressmen Paul Rogers and Dan Rostenkowski on April 25, 1977. The thrust of the Administration's bill was to limit inpatient hospital revenue increases for each year to specific percentage increases in revenue above a base year. The complicated formula provided for an approximate 9 percent revenue cap. Additionally, the bill would have imposed a national limitation for all hospital capital expenditures less than $2.5 billion.

The bill was jointly referred to the Ways and Means and Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee's Subcommittees on Health. The Commerce Subcommittee on Health, on which I serve, held markup sessions and approved an amended version of the bill for full Committee consideration on October 13, 1977. Although amended, the bill as reported by the Commerce Subcommitee on Health was basically similar to the legislation as first introduced in April.

It soon became evident that the bill's chances for passage in 1977 were in serious question. Opponents of the bill, including me, felt such a program was inequitable and unfair in singling out one segment of one industry for special economic controls. Further, many of my colleagues and I felt the bill would have a severe and adverse impact on small, rural hospitals which have tended to practice efficiency measures. Consequently, the bill failed to pass in the last session of Congress.

Then, last November, the health care industry was challenged by Representative Rostenkowski, Chairman of the Ways and Means Subcomittee on Health, to develop its own voluntary program to contain costs. The American Medical Association, the American Hospital Association and the Federation of American Hospitals agreed to meet that challenge by jointly sponsoring a nationwide voluntary cost containment program known as the "Voluntary Effort."

The objective of the Voluntary Effort is to achieve a 4 percent reduction in hospital cost expenditures over the first two years that the program is in effect. The voluntary program would allow a maximum rate of increase in hospital expenses for 1978 at 2 percent less than the rate of increase in 1977; for 1979, and each succeeding year, the allowable rate of increases would be 4 percent less than the rate of increase for 1977.

In response to the Voluntary Effort, Chairman Rostenkowski proposed an alternative to the Administration's bill. The Rostenkowski proposal was a two-part plan which would allow the hospital industry an opportunity to voluntarily achieve specified reductions in hospital expenditures. In the event this failed, a mandatory Federal revenue cap—a modification of the original H.R. 6575—would become effective. The Chairman began markup sessions in his subcommittee on February 8, 1978. On February 18, 1978, the Rostenkowski bill was approved by a narrow vote of 7 to 6 and reported to the full Ways and Means Committee.

The legislation was still surrounded in controversy in spite of the action by the two Health Subcommittees which had reported out amended versions of the original legislation. Then, on May 19, 1978, Chairman Rogers of the Commerce Health Subcommittee introduced a substitute hospital cost containment bill which modified his earlier bill previously reported by his subcommittee. The Rogers substitute bill conformed to the general outline of the "standby" cost containment program proposed by Chairman Rostenkowski. The Rogers bill would have provided for a conditional trial of the Voluntary Effort, however. A "trigger" mechanism would implement a standby version of the Administration's revenue cap of 9% on increases in hospital revenues if the Voluntary Effort were not successful.

While both the Rogers substitute and the Rostenkowski bill appeared to be reasonable compromises, it was still generally felt that these measures were inequitable. Both proposals would have undermined the very essence of a voluntary approach. They would not allow for the desirable flexibility and spontaneity sought through a voluntary program. They would discourage special efforts of hospitals to reduce expenditures as they would then be penalized under the "cap" program. Thus the threat of the fallback program would be self defeating.

The full House Commerce Committee began its markup sessions on the new Rogers substitute on June 6, 1978. Because of the inherent problems with the bill, numerous amendments were offered by Committee members. Consequently, the Committee spent almost seven weeks in markup sessions. It was becoming increasingly clear to the Committee that the bill was not a viable or workable program to address hospital costs. Further, proponents were successful in having the bill amended to exempt certain interests. For example, an amendment was approved 15 to 13 to provide a mandatory wage pass-through for non-supervisory employees. It seemed unfair and impractical to ask hospitals to control costs when non-supervisory wages, which comprise 40% of total hospital expenditures, would be exempt from consideration as an option for possible control.

After nearly seven weeks, the measure was being described as the "swiss cheese" bill. Various amendments, including ones sponsored by the opponents, had been adopted. But still, it was clear that the bill was simply a bad piece of legislation and not worthy of final passage by the Committee.

Accordingly, in an effort to strike a balanced compromise which was reasonable and workable, I offered a comprehensive amendment. My amendment has four basic parts:

1. To establish the goals of the Voluntary Effort to reduce the rate of increase in hospital costs; to establish a reporting and monitoring system; and to establish a National Commission on Hospital Costs to monitor the voluntary program and to immediately begin to study and make recommendations to the Congress on long-range reforms in reimbursement and cost control efforts;

2. To provide assistance to states desiring to institute their own cost containment programs. Each state (other than those which have already received assistance under Section 222 of the Social Security Amendments of 1972) could receive up to 80% of the amount needed to support a program. The state would be required to administer the program through a commission on hospital budgets or through a designated state agency;

3. To establish an annual limit of $4 billion on capital expenditures in excess of $150,000 which result in a net increase in bed capacity of Medicare hospitals. The limit applies only to bed capacity and not for equipment or construction;

4. Federal funds would be made available to assist hospitals to close those facilities and services deemed in excess as reviewed and approved by the HSA, state planning agency, and the Secretary.

On July 18th, my amendment was agreed to by a vote of 22 to 21. The Committee then voted 15 to 12 to report the bill out of Committee. The measure now goes to the House Ways and Means Committee. At the present time, it is uncertain what action, if any, that Committee will take this year.

Basically, my amendment encourages the hospital industry to further continue its successful Voluntary Effort to reduce the rate of increase in hospital expenditures. April data just released show the rate of increase in total hospital expenditures was 3.8 percentage points lower than the rate of increase for the entire year of 1977.

The Voluntary Effort is working. My amendment will allow the industry to continue its efforts, however. It should be noted that with the adoption of the Broyhill amendment, we are putting the industry on call. Should the Voluntary Effort fail, then the National Commission is to submit recommendations regarding cost containment to Congress within 60 days. Conceivably, the Commission could propose programs similar to the Administration bill.

The Broyhill amendment allows the industry to prove itself and thus avoid a new, cumbersome Federal program with all the bureaucratic regulations which accompany such action. More importantly, the threat of reduced or discontinued health services for millions of Americans, a probable result of the Administration's cost containment bill, is now avoided. The Broyhill amendment will allow a thorough and complete analysis of ways to address the problem of rising hospital costs.●

HUMAN RIGHTS—THE SOVIET VERSION AND OURS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BURKE) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. BURKE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, we have heard much of the recent sentences the Soviet Union meted out to Anatoly Scharansky and Aleksandr Ginzberg. These sentences are shocking and disheartening to all who have sympathy for individuals strong enough to stand for the basic human rights for human beings. We cannot be misled about Soviet intentions respecting human rights, nor can one argue that jailing Mr. Scharansky instead of executing him was an indication of Soviet leniency. It certainly indicates that the action of the Soviet courts is nothing more than a precise and forceful demonstration that nothing has changed in the Soviet system of a controlled society. The only real freedom in the Soviet Union is the freedom to agree with the state. Despite Soviet pronouncements about the Helsinki accords, despite protests from the West, the word to capture Soviet intentions and behavior is not "Helsinki," it is "Gulag."

Mr. Speaker, I need not repeat the dismal facts in Scharansky's case, other than to say that it is obvious that to suggest life is imperfect in the Soviet Union is such a threat to Soviet notions of loyalty that one's very life is subject to forfeit.

There is a point, however, in cases such as Scharansky, Ginzberg, and other objectors and ruthlessly mold public opinion at home that backfires on the Soviet Union. For all the Soviet's propaganda abroad they cannot prevent the free press of the West from reporting what monstrosities transpire in the Soviet Union. It is not enough that their own people must live in a world of "never question" where freedom is subversion, and where submission is freedom but by blatant pressures by the Soviet Union on American journalists try, fortunately without success, to condition the thinking of the free world. For some years the Soviets have sought through UNESCO and other sources to foster the notion that every country should manage its own press in the same manner as the Soviet Union does. In much of the Third World where basic freedoms of the press are often stifled, the Soviet suggestions have been welcomed. Now they have begun once again to try to manipulate the American press, I hope that our major news purveyor, NBC–TV, will cancel its multimillion dollar agreement to cover the 1980 Olympics without becoming a vehicle for Soviet influence.

Unfortunately, some of those who would try to convince the Western nations, and the American public in particular, of the morality of the Soviets' politically obscene treatment of its dissidents have had its helpful allies in our Nation.

Many analysts, including our own United Nations Ambassador Andrew Young have attempted to explain what Ambassador Young meant by reference to political prisoners in the United States. Ambassador Young, in essence, created the general impression that the United States has no right to criticize the Soviet Union for imprisoning Mr. Scharansky because we are equally guilty. In explaining his statements he said he meant that anyone who was in jail because he could not afford the best legal counsel was a political prisoner. I regret Ambassador Young, as our Ambassador to the U.N. is not aware of the basic differences.

The most thoughtful accounts that I have seen indicated that there are some 29,000 inmates in Federal prisons in this country, of whom at the most there might be a dozen who might be classed being in jail for political activities. For instance one prisoner is serving a term for attempting to overthrow the Government by force or violence; two are serving terms for espionage, and nine people are serving sentences for attempting political assassinations. There are, in addition 11 who are in prison for committing violence in pursuit of political aims. There were some, not long ago that called Alger Hiss a political prisoner—yet the trial of Alger Hiss has been analyzed and reanalyzed and according to reputable historians and legal scholars, not only was his trial fair but his guilt has been reputably verified.

Mr. Speaker, as a personal admirer of Andy Young, I consider it reprehensible for him to make the statement that he did—as one of our leaders in the United States and one who has benefited and enjoyed being elected and serving it, to refer to persons in jail because of economic circumstances as political prisoners is inexcusable. This sort of careless rhetoric implies either that it is subversive to be poor or that American society and law is determined to repress poor people by jailing them at public expense. To me, the statement, further implies that Andrew Young is as guilty as the rest of us of being shortsighted about the poor people.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear from the scandals disclosed from welfare programs that we have failed and spend more encouraging people to be poor than we do encouraging them to produce. It is obvious that a nation would not systematically repress the poor, and yet at the same time generously subsidize them.

Mr. Speaker, in the Soviet Union the government is sentencing its dissidents to jail and in some instances even those who have attempted merely to leave have invited harassment, arrest, and imprisonment. I cannot recall any American dissident who wanted to voluntarily leave the United States or give up his citizenship being refused permission to do so except if wanted for a crime. It is true that there have been several instances of such persons who left the United States, some perhaps to escape prosecution for criminal acts or for various idealistic reasons, but I recall also those who emigrated to these so-called Socialist paradises who have since returned to the United States considerably wiser. One of these is Eldridge Cleaver. In short it is very clear that there are vast and sharp contrasts between systematic Soviet oppression and accidental American abuses. No society is perfect and certainly we recognize that the American economic and legal systems are not without flaw. And I am sure that some are sentenced to terms in jail when perhaps with better legal assistance, they would not. Yet, we do try to tolerate those who disagree with our system just as long as they do not break the laws established to protect life and property.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the differences between American and Soviet societies are not erased by superficial comparisons supported only by sophomoric logic. To make such a dishonest statement only plays into the hands of those who would convince us that it really does not matter to the United States that thousands of Jews and Christians face persecution, intimidation, prison, and even torture at the hands of the Soviet Government. It is absurd to say that no society is free of blemish, and hence no society has the right to criticize injustices in another. I do not and will not believe this kind of irresponsible thinking. If we are to hold freedom dear to Americans, then we must hold it dear to all people everywhere. To suggest that freedom is less important to other peoples than it is to us is a betrayal of our own selves and the freedoms we presently enjoy.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot compromise our consciences by remaining silent against the injustices practiced by other nations.●

NATIONAL CONSUMER CO-OP BANK, H.R. 2777

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. ROUSSELOT) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, in a few days, the House will vote on the Conference Bill on H.R. 2777, the National Consumer Cooperative Bank Act. This bill reported by the Committee of Conference is the same as the Senate bill, except that the Bank would be permitted to borrow up to 10 times its paid-in capital and surplus instead of 5 times, as provided in the Senate bill.

I urge my colleagues to defeat this measure. A National Consumer Cooperative Bank has never been shown to be worthy of a Federal effort and it stands now as a clear test of our response to the taxpayers' message of revolt.

A "no" vote will provide a welcome opportunity to assist the President in achieving his goal of cutting the budget for fiscal year 1979 by $5 billion and of achieving cuts for subsequent years as well. When the President announced that cuts would be needed, he declined to identify specific programs to cut. If he is serious, I call upon the President to name this bill as his first specific effort to cut future budgets.

There are several reasons why this bill would be an excellent place to begin:

First. Defeat of this bill would save $100 million for fiscal year 1979 and a total of $200 million over the succeeding 4 years in seed money for the Bank. It would also save $10 million for fiscal year 1979 and a total of $65 million for the succeeding 2 fiscal years in funding for the Self-Help Development Fund.

Second. The administration has had great difficulty determining whether there is a need for this bill. Originally, it strongly opposed the coop bank and called instead for a study. Upon deciding to support the bill, its justification was hardly convincing. A second change in position would be much more credible, for now the administration can at least find strong reason to oppose this increase in spending.

Third. Defeat of this bill will not cause the elimination of any existing programs or the displacement of any existing jobs. Therefore, the decision to cut this program is relatively easy compared to the much harder decisions that will have to be faced later on if the President's budget reduction target is to be reached.

If budget cuts are to be made, it certainly makes sense to stop creating new nonessential programs which will become unassailable priorities in future budgets.

The nationwide surge of sentiment for reductions in taxes and spending at all levels of government which was manifest by the approval of proposition 13 makes it clear that the public mood strongly opposes the establishment of unnecessary new programs, such as the Co-op Bank.

Mr. Speaker, I urge our colleagues to cast their votes in opposition to this new spending measure and in full support for the President's call for budget reductions in 1979. I call upon the President to demonstrate his resolve to cut the budget by withdrawing support for this unnecessary addition to the 1979 and future budgets.●

GARY A. MYERS AMENDMENT TO INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ASSISTANCE ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GARY A. MYERS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, when the House considers the International Security Assistance Act, I plan to offer an amendment which would provide the President with increased flexibility in dealing with the arms embargo issue. In essence, my amendment would retain the limited arms embargo against Turkey while providing the President with additional authority to lift the embargo if he determines and legally certifies to Congress that the national security of the United States will be immediately threatened or irreparably harmed by a continuation of the restrictions.

I would like to emphasize that any legal certification which asserts that lifting the arms embargo is essential to U.S. national security is no simple task. The President would be forced to balance and consider the possible loss of Turkey as a NATO ally or an effective NATO partner and the vital U.S. surveillance bases located there against any potential adverse reactions in both Cyprus and Greece and the potential loss of U.S. Naval bases in Greece if the embargo were lifted.

It seems reasonable that the executive branch is best equipped and properly structured to gather and evaluate vital information on ending the arms embargo as well as to conduct a comprehensive analysis regarding the impact of ending this embargo.

Congress should not lift the arms embargo while the conditions under which Turkey violated U.S. arms transfer law still exist. To do so would run contrary to the principle of maintaining the arms embargo until positive negotiations are initiated between the parties involved.

However, it is clear that the language in section 620(x) of the current legislation is seriously flawed. No provision is made to grant the executive the necessary flexibility to insure that our primary goal is taken into consideration; that is, the President should be given the option to lift the embargo if he is thoroughly convinced and able to legally certify to Congress that the U.S. national security is immediately threatened or irreparably harmed by the continuation of such restrictions. It should be stressed that such a determination must include a detailed assessment of the repercussions in Greece as a result of lifting the embargo. Such a determination would in no way absolve Turkey from its illegal action but it would prevent Congress and the President from facing a no-win situation in which the United States would be the ultimate loser. As the Greek-American constituents who have contacted me have indicated, above all else, we must place the interests of America first.

In recent weeks I have been in contact with administration officials on several occasions and have discussed this complex issue at length with them. It has become clear to me that if the administration is capable of producing a preponderance of evidence indicating that U.S. security would be harmed by a maintenance of the embargo, then Congress should, at a minimum, provide the Executive with the flexibility to lift these restrictions.

I would like to share a letter which I wrote to the President regarding this issue.

JULY 14, 1978.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I would like to thank you for giving me the opportunity to personally hear your arguments in favor of lifting the arms embargo against Turkey. I found the breakfast meeting and my follow-up discussions with U.S. Ambassador Ronald I. Spiers useful and informative.

However, during our breakfast meeting, time did not permit me to raise one particular issue with you; it has occurred to me that Congress has already granted the Administration adequate flexibility to end the arms embargo, assuming that certain conditions have been fulfilled. These conditions furthermore appear to be included in your rationale as to why Congress should vote to lift the arms embargo. Namely, as I read Section 620 X of the International Security Assistance Act, it states that the embargo can be lifted if ". . . the President determines and certifies to the Congress that the Government of Turkey is in compliance with the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the Foreign Military Sales Act, and any agreement entered into under such Acts, and that substantial progress toward agreement has been made regarding military forces in Cyprus. . ."

Consequently, if the information you possess convinces you that Turkey is moving toward gradual demilitarization of Cyprus and is willing to pledge to use U.S. supplied weapons only for defensive purposes within the context of the NATO security zone, then you should make such a determination, as provided under the law. Congress would then have the opportunity to react to your decision.

I fully realize that you would prefer Congressional action to lift the arms embargo rather than face the ambiguity associated with a unilateral Presidential determination that the conditions for ending the arms embargo have been met. I commend you for your sensitivity to constitutional comity regarding both the role of Congress and the Executive in the realm of foreign policy. However, I am willing to concede that the Executive branch is in a better position to evaluate those subjective factors existing within and among foreign leadership groups (which are virtually impossible to convey to the Congress) and which are so vital in any realistic assessment of the opportunities for achieving our objectives.

There are three related questions which I believe to be especially relevant to this issue and which I would like to raise at this time.

1. To what degree have the actions of the Turkish Government regarding Cyprus fulfilled the criteria which would permit you to exercise your flexibility under Section 620 X?

2. What are the missing factors, if any, in these Turkish efforts?

3. Have these factors (in number two above, if any) been conveyed to the Turkish Government?

Although, at this time, I cannot agree with you that it is in the best interest of this country to lift the arms embargo until Turkey takes more concrete action to end its illegal occupation of Cyprus, it appears that you do possess the authority under Section 620 X to determine otherwise and to act according to your analysis of that complex situation.

Sincerely,

GARY A. MYERS,

The administration's reply came in the form of a personal visit from the Counselor of the Department of State, Mr. Matthew Nimetz. In essence, Mr. Nimetz described the difficulty of any diplomatic effort to present the Turkish Government with a list of criteria to be fulfilled which would permit the administration to lift the arms embargo under the terms of section 620(x). In Mr. Nimetz' opinion, 620(x) did not afford sufficient flexibility to the executive to lift the embargo under present circumstances even if U.S. national security interests were in jeopardy.

I consider this to be a serious flaw in the current legislation and consequently I plan to offer a remedy for this inflexibility when the House considers the International Security Assistance Act.

THE DENIAL OF HUMAN RIGHTS—CASE NO. 71

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FLOOD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the violation of basic human rights is indeed a subject of much attention and debate today, but at times we must be reminded that the denial of civil liberties is not only confined to Communist nations. It is apparent that in Northern Ireland, those detained in prisons, out of the watchful eye of the public, are often denied civil rights as well.

Recently, as you know, Amnesty International, the Nobel Prize winning organization, has boldly investigated the conditions of Castlereagh Prison in Northern Ireland. The atrocities committed at the hands of the Royal Ulster Constabulary are indeed an outrage to every man, woman, and child in Ireland, the United Kingdom, and the United States. The focus on the denial of human rights in Castlereagh is a constant reminder of the atrocities which have been committed in Ulster throughout its bloody history.

As a member of the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee on Irish Affairs, it is my duty to provide you with the facts of Case No. 71, and to remind you that even as we stand here today, the conditions facing this prisoner are duplicated throughout Castlereagh Prison and throughout Northern Ireland.

CASE NO. 71

Male, arrested 1977, then brought to Castlereagh Holding Centre. Detained four days, then transfered to Crumlin Road Jail. Had a medical examination on arrival at Castlereagh and also during his stay there. No information about medical examination on release.

Maltreatment alleged: threats, beating, hairpulling, direct trauma to the head, head banged against a wall. Kicking. Thrown to the floor, one of the interrogators jumped on his back. Choking. Penis and testicles twisted. Beaten in kidney area and on his back with a chair.

Symptoms: no first hand information, but a relative has stated that he had difficulties moving and was nervous and shaking.

Medical reports: by Dr. Y1, examinations the day he arrived at the detention center (1) and two days later (2).

Signs: (1): no signs. (2): bruises on the face, heels and across his shouler blades and upper back and neck. Tenderness on palpation in the stomach, throat, clavicula and right lower leg. An area of tenderness and swelling localised to the right bursa sub patellaris. Bruises on the right upper arm. Tenderness in the scalp.

Conclusion: There is consistency between the alleged maltreatment and the signs. It would be of great interest to compare Dr. Y1's report with the police doctor's report.●

GREATER CLEVELAND BAR OPPOSES FEDERAL CRIMINAL CODE PROVISIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. STOKES) is recogized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, There is great concern nationwide over the proposed Criminal Code Reform, S. 1437/H.R. 6869. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I feel that this concern is totally justified.

S. 1437/H.R. 6869, should it be passed, would expend Federal jurisdiction to areas never before reserved for our Federal Government. This bill broadens Federal law enforcement powers by increasing jurisdiction for Federal prosecutors, Federal agents, and Federal investigative agencies. The expansion of Federal police power without showing a dire need would be a dangerous infringement upon our constitutional rights.

S. 1437/H.R. 6869 tells judges that they are to regard prisons to be for detainment and forget about rehabilitation. The basic anatomy of criminal justice embodied in the sentencing provisions to this bill creates a mentality that would be satisfied to imprison rather than attempt to solve the enigma of criminal justice in this Nation.

The Bar Association of Greater Cleveland's Criminal Court Committee has written the official position of the Bar Association with regard to the proposed Federal Criminal Code. So that my colleagues in the House may share in its message, I would like to submit for the RECORD the Bar Association of Greater Cleveland's press release of July 17, 1978, and its position paper on the proposed Federal criminal code:

GREATER CLEVELAND BAR OPPOSES FEDERAL CRIMINAL CODE PROVISIONS

The Bar Association of Greater Cleveland today announced strong opposition to two provisions of the proposed new Federal Criminal Code.

The Bar's position was announced by President Andrew L. Johnson, Jr., after the Board of Trustees approved the report and recommendations from the Association's Criminal Law Committee.

The Association specifically opposed:

Establishing a Sentencing Commission and a procedure which "is more mechanical than fair and dangerously infringes upon judicial discretion."

Expanding the federal jurisdiction "at the expense of the states' rights to fashion their own criminal laws."

Under the new Code with its expanding jurisdiction "the federal criminal case load may be increased by 183,150 cases per year," the Criminal Law Committee reported to the Bar's Board of Trustees.

"This would create total chaos within the federal prison and court systems," the report stated.

The Committee emphasized that by pinpointing the provision on sentencing and the jurisdictional provisions, it did not intend to suggest it approved "in total, the remainder of the Bill."

"Rather, it is our belief that these are two issues of the most immediate concern," the report indicated.

Copies of the committee's report which became the official position upon approval by the Board of Trustees, were sent to members of Congress and the two Ohio Senators.

REPORT TO THE BAR ASSOCIATION OF GREATER CLEVELAND: S. 1437: THE PROPOSED FEDERAL CRIMINAL CODE

INTRODUCTION

On April 20, 1978, Dennis Butler, Chairman of the Criminal Law Committee of the Bar Association of Greater Cleveland appointed Gordon S. Friedman to head a subcommittee to review the proposed federal criminal code, S. 1437. What follows is a report of that sub-committee.

I. PENALTY AND SENTENCING PROVISIONS

The penalty and sentencing provision of S. 1437 proposes major changes in the criminal justice system. It is the conclusion of the Committee that the present bill will not realize its own objectives and will very likely create greater hazards and disparity within the area of sentencing.

THE SENTENCING COMMISSION

Under Section 99, a Sentencing Commission is to be created within the judicial branch and will consist of seven members. Four members, including the chairman, are to be selected by the President and three are to be designated by the Judicial Conference. The goal of the commission is to establish sentencing guidelines, policies and practices for use by trial judges in the federal criminal justice system.

The creation of a Sentencing Commission injects politics into the critical area of sentencing in criminal cases. It supports a system of presumptive sentences and transfers significant sentencing authority to the prosecutor. The commission strips the trial court of crucial discretion in the imposition of sentences under the guise of certainty and fairness.[1] Experience has shown that trial courts have at times abused their discretion in the imposition of criminal sentences. However, it is the Committee's belief that the creation of the Sentencing Commission will not adequately deal with the problem of sentence disparity. It will merely transfer power and the potential for its abuse to a less viable, less accountable political entity—the Sentencing Commission.

The standards recommended by the Commission will replace judicial discretion with rigid and often inappropriate standards that may fit the crime but not the criminal. Furthermore, S. 1437 would allow for appellate review of sentences only if a sentence is above or below Commission standards. In the latter case, the prosecutor may appeal the sentence. The Committee rejects this procedure and suggests that it is inconsistent with the Constitution.

The Committee considers the appellate review of sentences to be a strong alternative to the Sentencing Commission and to disparate sentences. However, the Committee rejects the prosecutorial right to appeal sentences. We believe this position is borne out by the ABA's Report on Standards Relating to Appellate Review of Sentences (approved draft 1968). There is no existing law permitting the federal prosecutor to appeal criminal sentences.

Passage of S. 1437 in its present form shall increase the frequency and length of jail sentences; notwithstanding the fact that the United States presently has the most severe jail sentences in the free world.[2] Under S. 1437, maximum sentences are increased and the use of mandatory minimum sentences are also increased. There is, as noted earlier, a presumption in favor of incarceration. The ideal of rehabilitation of offenders is literally written out of the new criminal code. Likewise, S. 1437 totally ignores any rehabilitative scheme for the youthful offender as is presently found in the Youth Offender Act. Finally, S. 1437 significantly reduces the trial court's authority to reconsider a criminal sentence pursuant to Rule 35 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

This Committee supports a reconsideration and reform of the imposition of criminal sentences in the Federal courts. However, S. 1437 fails to properly address itself to the problems posed. It is not a reform but rather a device to impose sentences in an inflexible manner. The Committee recommends and accepts the findings and conclusions regarding S. 1437 found in the Bar Association of New York's report on S. 1437 as well as the position paper and testimony of the Federal Public and Community Defenders. The Committee concludes that S. 1437's sentencing provisions should not pass in its present form.

II. THE NEW CODE AS IT AFFECTS JURISDICTION

S. 1437 attempts to expand federal jurisdiction to a boundary heretofore unprecedented in American jurisprudence. This expansion would be accomplished by several methods. First, jurisdiction is significantly extended in the area of crimes against property and persons by key jurisdictional phrases that have been incorporated into the legislation. These phrases suggest that in certain areas an incident that can only be remotely connected to federal jurisdiction, might give rise to a federal indictment.

Next, jurisdiction is expanded by making into an offense acts that make use of a facility of interstate commerce or crossing a state boundary, even though the acts do not affect or impact commerce or a federal interest. This is a significant departure from similar existing law under 18 U.S.C. Sections 865 and 1952.

Furthermore, jurisdiction is expanded by making federal crimes, certain acts committed during the course of another federal offense, even though the acts themselves may not be of federal character. All together in this category there are seventeen seemingly "non-federal" acts that, if committed during the course of numerous federally proscribed acts, become federal offenses. Thus, statistically there is the possibility for several variations on the same theme and a consequent plethora of new federal offenses; [3] all this notwithstanding the insignificance of the federal interest in the underlying crime.

Further, jurisdiction is expanded by more subtle, indirect methods, e.g. the burden of proof of certain affirmative defenses on the prosecution is less stringent in the federal court than the state court under the new law thus presumably encouraging "forum shopping" where the prosecution anticipates difficulty in the state court. Finally under S. 1437 the prosescution has virtually unbridled discretion because of the legislation's failure to set guidelines or other effective legislative control or discretion.

COMMENT

If much of the new legislation is not utilized by the prosecution (this being the suggestion of many), the obvious question becomes, "why clutter an already cluttered system with more extra baggage?" The obvious dysfunctional affect of new, unused statutes is obvious.

If, on the other hand, the prosecution fully employs its expanded jurisdiction, (which is only logical to assume) the massive dangers are equally obvious. In this latter event the threat is twofold. First of all there exists a threat of a federal "takeover" of state and individual rights. Secondly, there exists the likelihood of an overwhelmingly increased docket load in the courts and increase in federal penitentiary population.

As to the first threat, the bill's opposition clearly indicated that the bill would "curtail constitutional rights and civil liberties and would inhibit 'whistle blowing on government wrong-doing'." [4] Furthermore, if there is employment of the expanded jurisdiction, there seemingly would be a complementary expansion of federal law enforcement and its organization. The probability of federal usurpation of state rights causes concern.

Regarding the increase in prison population, and criminal litigation, the United States Courts docket approximately 38,000 to 40,000 criminal cases per annum. Experts feel that the caseload could be increased by 183,150 cases per annum under the new code.[5] It is hard to imagine the catastrophic effect of such an increased caseload on an already over burdened system.

CONCLUSION

The Criminal Law Committee of the Bar Association of Greater Cleveland supports the need for the reform and recodification of the federal criminal law. However, S.1437 in its present form is unacceptable. In particular the Committee rejects the creation of a Sentencing Commission and the sentencing scheme of the proposed legislation. It represents a device that is more mechanical than fair and dangerously infringes upon judicial discretion. Furthermore, the Committee cannot support S.1437's expansion of federal jurisdiction at the expense of the states right to fashion their own criminal laws. Under the new code with its expanding jurisdiction there is the potential that the federal criminal case load may be increased by 183,150 cases per year. This would create total chaos within the federal prison and court systems.

By focusing on the sentencing and jurisdictional provisions of S.1437 this Committee in no way adopts in total the remainder of the bill. Rather, it is our belief that these are two issues of the most immediate concern.

A BETTER FARM PROGRAM NEEDED

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. NOLAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, since the 1930's, Congress and succeeding administrations have remained committed to maintaining a farm program which establishes price supports for agricultural commodities at a level which will give farmers an opportunity to recover their cost of production. According to President Carter, the 1977 farm bill was no exception. In his statement prior to signing the 1977 farm bill, the President described it as a great piece of legislation which would cover the production costs of most farmers.

The farmers, however, knew better. The level of price protection in the 1977 farm bill was ridiculously low, as many Members of Congress realized, but the administration had repeatedly threatened to veto anything more realistic. The farmers then decided to come to Washington to personally get the message across to Congress and the Carter administration. Congress and the President responded by making a few concessions which improved the set-aside, grain reserve, and price support programs, but the support levels still remained far too low.

The farmers continued their efforts to persuade Congress to consider a long-range farm bill instead of piecemeal efforts to get agriculture back on an even keel. On June 6, 1978, national delegates representing the American Agriculture Movement unanimously endorsed the Economic Recovery Act (H.R. 12689)—a comprehensive, long-range farm bill which I had introduced the previous month. The Economic Recovery Act would bring farm commodity prices up to 100 percent of parity in the marketplace within 5 years, implementing the economic goals outlined in the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act.

Efforts during the past several weeks to build support for the Economic Recovery Act have garnered 24 cosponsors, but the measure will not receive serious consideration until a substantially larger number of Members endorse the bill. Experience indicates that building wide support for the bill will be an educational effort requiring considerable time and more intensive lobbying by farmers and their allies. My long-range goal for agriculture continues to be the farm program outlined in the Economic Recovery Act, as well as in the Family Farm Development Act (H.R. 10739), but it will take time for such long-range farm programs to emerge from the legislative process.

In the meantime, farmers continue to face an economic crunch as market prices, particularly for grains, fail to cover costs of production. In western Minnesota, grain prices remain at exceedingly low levels. Despite the claims of Carter administration officials, grain prices have not improved much since last year. A comparison of western Minnesota prices received by farmers for various grains and soybeans on July 25, 1977, and on the same date in 1978 reveals the inadequacy of current market prices:

|---|---|
| 1977: | |
| Wheat (43% of parity) | $2.19 |
| Corn (50% of parity) | 1.75 |
| Soybeans (83% of parity) | 6.36 |
| Oats (52% of parity) | .91 |
| 1978: | |
| Wheat (50% of parity) | 2.65 |
| Corn (48% of parity) | 1.76 |
| Soybeans (68% of parity) | 5.90 |
| Oats (50% of parity) | .96 |

The figures demonstrate that grain prices are generally not any better than a year ago and, indeed, are worse when rising costs of production are taken into account. The Carter administration's set-aside and reserve programs have failed to adequately raise market prices for wheat and feedgrains. The current market prices, as well as the support levels and target prices, are a disaster which seriously aggravates the U.S. balance-of-payments deficit to the detriment of farmers and consumers alike.

Congress has given the administration all the authority it needs to implement a good farm program. The Carter administration already has the authority it needs to provide realistic price protection administratively—without new legislation. The law allows the administration to raise price support levels for milk, wheat, feedgrains, and soybeans to 90 percent of parity. To date, however, the Carter administration has failed to raise price supports to adequate levels.

NOW IS THE TIME TO IMPLEMENT 1976 BERGLAND FARM PRICE RESOLUTION

In early 1976, when the market prices for farm products were sliding below USDA's cost of production figures, then Congressman Bob Bergland introduced a resolution (H. Con. Res. 578) calling upon Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz to use his existing administrative authority to "promptly raise price support levels to 90 percent of parity." Congressman Bergland described such an action as "exactly what should be done as soon as possible to offer protection to farmers * * *."

In March 1977, Agriculture Secretary Bergland brought the Carter administration's 1977 farm bill to the Hill. The new Agriculture Secretary's former colleagues were dismayed at the President's meager proposals. Bergland himself was lukewarm, admitting that the Carter farm program "was not what I would suggest" as a private citizen. Since that time, the Carter administration has failed to heed Bob Bergland's advice on a number of occasions. If Congress passed Bergland's 90 percent of parity resolution today, the President's economic advisers and the Office of Management and Budget would be sure to prohibit the Secretary of Agriculture from raising the support levels. It is up to Congress to provide Secretary Bergland with the 90 percent of parity loan program he requested in 1976.

The need for a better farm program is obvious. The spread between cost of production and current market prices—particularly for wheat, feedgrains, and soybeans—is now wider than the spread which existed at the time Bergland introduced his resolution.

JOINT RESOLUTION TO RAISE SUPPORT LEVELS

Today, therefore, I am introducing a joint resolution similar to the one which Congressman Bergland introduced on March 9, 1976. Rather than being an advisory measure, my joint resolution requires the Carter administration to raise the loan rates on milk, wheat, feedgrains, soybeans, and cotton to 90 percent of parity. In addition, the joint resolution also adjusts the grain reserve's release and call-in levels to 100 percent and 110 percent of parity respectively.

Except for cotton, the administration already has the authority under existing law to raise the support levels for the above-mentioned commodities to 90 percent of parity. The joint resolution mandating 90 percent of parity prices represents an immediate step, which Congress can take before this session adjourns, to realistically improve the existing price support programs.

Raising and stabilizing the prices of milk, wheat, feedgrains, soybeans and cotton will have a positive effect not only in the farm sector but also throughout the Nation's entire economy:

Livestock producers will benefit, because leveling out the wide swings in the price of feedgrains will restrain the equally wide swings in the cattle production and price cycle.

Raising the loan rates and adjusting the grain reserve's release and call-in levels will improve the administration's ability to rationalize production and promote orderly marketing, because more farmers will have an incentive to participate in the existing set-aside and reserve programs.

Raising the support levels will not increase Treasury costs because, as President Carter himself has stated, commodity loans are a recoverable item for the Government.

Raising the loan levels to 90 percent of parity will fight inflation by putting earned income into the hands of farmers and the unemployed, thus reducing interest rates and the balance-of-payments deficit.

Congress therefore should enact the joint resolution mandating 90 percent of parity as soon as possible in order to provide farmers and consumers with price stability at levels fair to both, while generating the agricultural income necessary to stimulate the Nation's economy.

The joint resolution already has the support of many farmers. Meeting in St. Louis on July 21-22, national delegates representing the American Agriculture Movement unanimously endorsed the resolution as a move Congress should take immediately. In Washington, D.C. National Farmers Union spokesman Reuben Johnson also endorsed the resolution, terming it "consistent with Farmers Union policy and a step in the right direction toward providing farmers with the price protection they need."

I urge my colleagues to join in support of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution follows:

H.J. RES. 1093—JOINT RESOLUTION RAISING THE PRICE SUPPORT LEVELS FOR MILK, WHEAT CORN, SOYBEANS AND COTTON TO 90 PER CENTUM OF THE RESPECTIVE PARITY PRICES THEREFOR, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

Whereas Congress has given the Secretary of Agriculture the authority to raise the price support levels and target prices for agricultural commodities in order to provide farmers with realistic price protection; and

Whereas the Secretary of Agriculture already has the authority to raise the price support levels for milk, wheat, corn and soybeans to 90 per centum of the respective parity prices; and

Whereas the prices farmers receive for major agricultural commodities remain at levels which are below the cost of production: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That title I of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section 113:

"SEC. 113. (a) Notwithstanding section 201 of this Act, the price of milk shall be supported at not less than 90 per centum of the parity price therefor.

"(b) Notwithstanding section 107 of this Act, the Secretary shall make available to producers loans and purchases on each crop of wheat at not less than 90 per centum of the parity price therefor.

"(c) Notwithstanding section 105 of this Act, the Secretary shall make available to producers loans and purchases on each crop of corn at not less than 90 per centum of the parity price therefor.

"(d) Notwithstanding sections 201 and 301 of this Act, the Secretary shall make available to producers loans and purchases on each crop of soybeans at not less than 90 per centum of the parity price therefor.

"(e) Notwithstanding section 103 of this Act, the Secretary shall make available to producers loans and purchases on each crop of upland cotton at not less than 90 per centum of the parity price therefor.

"(f) Section 110 of this title is amended by deleting parts (5) and (6) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"'(5) conditions designed to induce producers to redeem and market the wheat or feed grains securing such loans without regard to the maturity dates thereof whenever the Secretary determines that the market prices of wheat or feed grains have attained a specified level which is not less than 100 per centum of the respective parity price therefor; and (6) conditions prescribed by the Secretary under which the Secretary may require producers to repay such loans, plus accrued interest thereon, and other charges as may be required by regulation, whenever the Secretary determines that the market prices of wheat or feed grains are not less than 110 per centum of the respective parity price therefor.'" ●

MEMBERS OF WAYS AND MEANS TRADE SUBCOMMITTEE URGE PRESIDENT TO CONSIDER SURCHARGES AGAINST JAPANESE IMPORTS FOR BALANCE-OF-PAYMENTS PURPOSES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, last week five members of the House Ways and Means Committee's Subcommittee on Trade wrote to President Carter urging that he consider using 1974 Trade Act balance-of-payments authority to impose temporary import surcharges of up to 15 percent for a period not to exceed 150 days on Japanese imports.

We wrote urging consideration of this strong and unprecedented action because United States-Japan trade imbalances "are reaching the danger point, threatening international monetary stability and our own competitive payments and trade position in the world economy."

The letter points out that in numerous meetings with Japanese officials, the subcommittee members have warned that improved access to Japanese markets must be obtained:

These warnings that time and patience are running out do not appear to be taken seriously.

Our letter contains trade statistics which clearly explain the rising concern in the Congress over United States-Japan trade imbalances and the need for corrective action:

JULY 25, 1978.

HON. JIMMY CARTER,
The President,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We have watched with increasing concern the continuing weakness of the United States dollar in relation to other major currencies and our substantial balance-of-payments and balance-of-trade deficits overall and particularly the no longer acceptable trade deficit with Japan. These serious and continuing imbalances are reaching the danger point, threatening international monetary stability and our own competitive payments and trade position in the world economy.

The United States deficit on current account was over $15 billion last year and is already over $6 billion in the first quarter of 1978, the worst balance-of-payments deficit in our history. The United States experienced a record trade deficit last year of over $26 billion, a deficit already in the first quarter of 1978 of nearly $10 billion. The dollar is declining daily in terms of the Japanese yen.

The rapid appreciation of the yen should have made Japanese goods far less competitive in the United States market and United States exports cheaper and more attractive in Japan with the decline of the dollar. Instead, United States exports to Japan have declined in the first four months of this year while imports from Japan have increased 48 percent. The trade deficit with Japan is increasing so far this year to $12 billion from $8 billion in 1977.

The Members of the Subcommittee on Trade have repeatedly pointed out to Minister Ushiba and other Japanese officials during their visits to Washington in recent months that Japan should undertake measures in the Multilateral Trade Negotiations to improve access to the Japanese market substantially and fulfill its commitments in the January Strauss-Ushiba communique to reduce the current acount imbalance with the United States soon if a liberal trade posture and favorable reaction to the result of the trade negotiations with Japan are to be sustained in the Congress. These warnings that time and patience are running out do not appear to be taken seriously.

We have considered the options available under the circumstances and, short of direct action such as that envisaged in section 122 of the Trade Act of 1974, the chances for immediate action are limited. As you know, section 122 requires the President to proclaim a temporary import surcharge of up to 15 percent and/or temporary import quotas for a period not exceeding 150 days whenever special measures to restrict imports are required to deal with a large and serious United States balance-of-payments deficit, to prevent an imminent and significant depreciation of the dollar in foreign exchange markets, or to cooperate with other countries in correcting an international balance-of-payments disequilibrium. Import restrictions are to be applied on a non-discriminatory basis to all countries unless the President determines the purpose would best be served by action against only one or more countries having large or persistent balance-of-payments surpluses.

The basic problem of economic imbalances has been discussed and possible solutions considered, in bilateral talks, in discussions in the context of the MTN, and at the Summit in Bonn. There appear to be few alternatives to deal with the immediate threat of the continued imbalance in our international accounts. Therefore, we urge you to give full consideration to action under section 122.

Sincerely,

Charles A. Vanik, Chairman; Bill Frenzel, Dan Rostenkowski, James R. Jones, and William A. Steiger.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from New York (Ms. HOLTZMAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be present for the following vote. If I had been present, I would have voted as indicated.

July 24, 1978: Rollcall 588, "yes."●

STATEMENT BY THE HONORABLE DAN ROSTENKOWSKI, CHAIRMAN, SUBCOMMITTEE ON HEALTH OF THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS, CONCERNING PRESIDENT CARTER'S STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES ON NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, in announcing his principles for national health insurance this past weekend, President Carter has taken a prudent and responsible step forward in the development of legislation to improve the structure and operation of health care financing in this country. The 10 principles announced by the President represent a realistic commitment in a legislative and social area that is complex and controversial.

The President's outline, with which I concur, recognizes wisely, in my view, that a program of major magnitude should not—and for that matter, will not—be debated in an economic vacuum. The principles he has announced demonstrate both his commitment to a comprehensive health care program and his desire to see that program actually enacted.

The President's national health insurance principles, by facing economic and budgetary realities squarely, deprive him of the political luxury afforded others who can augur from absolutist premises. On the one side are those who have insisted on an uncompromising commitment to a costly program regardless of competing budgetary priorities. On the other side are those who continue to oppose any meaningful health care reform. The President now occupies the middle.

By rejecting the political temptation to promise in health care legislation what he could not hope to deliver, the President has put himself in a better position to deliver what others have for years only promised.●

IN SUPPORT OF THE ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. PREYER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PREYER. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to join with my colleagues in supporting the reauthorization of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (H.R. 15). This bill is noteworthy for the emphasis the Carter administration is giving to quality education for our schoolchildren. However, it is probably more pertinent to note that it was passed without an acrimonious and divisive debate over "busing" which has normally accompanied any education bill in Congress in recent years.

It appears that the American people, through their elected Representatives in the House, are beginning to come to grips with what "desegregation" really means, and are receptive to some constructive discussion of the link between "desegregation" and quality in education.

For the first time since title IV of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, this body is encouraging the States to assist local school districts in planning for voluntary ways to reduce racial isolation in its educational system. Necessary funds for technical assistance and training are provided. This program, however, is optional, and the House is merely making the opportunity available for responsible State involvement in planning for peaceful community support for desegregation. The principal State incentive is a 2-to-1 Federal match should the State government decide to accept this opportunity.

If the States pursue this challenge, it may bring about a significant change in the desegregation process of this country. Both the Congress and the States have generally refrained from pursuit of a rational desegregation policy since the 1954 Brown against Board of Education decision. The Brown ruling stated that, as a constitutional principle, States could not discriminate between schoolchildren on the basis of race, and that the doctrine of "separate but equal" had no place in our public education system.

Thus, the Court initiated a judicially dominated decisionmaking process in desegregation. From that time to the present, there has been a long and difficult road for our children and communities toward the goal of equal educational opportunity—a goal we have yet to achieve.

During this process, much criticism has been leveled at the Federal judges who were ordering the desegregation plans. This has occurred, because their plans often included busing, failed to improve the quality of education for all the students, and disrupted community life.

In fairness, it should be pointed out that it was not the obligation of the courts to issue orders designed to improve the quality of education, although many judges wisely did attempt to maintain or upgrade the quality of education during the desegregation process. Their obligation and responsibility was limited to guaranteeing equality of education, as required by the 14th amendment and enunciated in decisions of the Supreme Court. However, in so doing, the Federal judiciary often usurped local control of the educational process.

Congress, in an emotional reaction to the shift away from local control, did take action, but unfortunately used the device of amendment to appropriations bills which has proven totally futile. Time and again, Congress has prohibited the use of Federal funds to pay for transportation of students for purposes of desegregation. In so doing, Congress has used its legislative power to create false hopes rather than developing national leadership in this area.

Under this new planning section of the Emergency School Aid Act, the House is setting an example of leadership. Responsibility rests with the States, where innovation, community involvement, and community control can become reality. The bill explicitly says that grants to States must necessarily be developed in consultation with teachers, educators, parents, and representatives of the general public. Furthermore, the proportion of minority group individuals involved in this consultatioin must approximate the proportion of minority group children enrolled in the elementary and secondary schools in the State.

All of us, and I believe this includes most of those in all three branches of the Federal Government, know that neither the Congress, the courts, nor the Department of Heatlh, Education, and Welfare can run local schools very well. The State and local people who will benefit or suffer the most as a result of the decisions that are made in education are the people who ought to provide leadership.

As the late, distinguished law professor, Alexander Bickel, stated:

Trying to ward off busing by lashing out against it negatively can at best be partly effective—and then at the cost of damage to our educational system—because busing is only a symbol of what we wish to ward off and change. What is needed is the affirmative provision of constructive alternatives to busing.

Hopefully, the States will welcome this opportunity to design constructive alternatives. The stakes are high, because positive action could very well provide the link between equal opportunity in education and quality in education.

This is a small first step, but in taking it, we will again be nurturing the spirit of moderation in our society which courts alone cannot provide. To quote Judge Learned Hand:

(A) Society so riven that the spirit of moderation is gone, no court can save; that a society where that spirit flourishes, no court need save; that in a society which evades its responsibility by thrusting upon courts the nurture of that spirit, that spirit in the end will perish.●

STATEMENT OF CHAIRMAN AL ULLMAN, COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS, WITH RESPECT TO THE RULE TO BE REQUESTED ON H.R. 13511, REVENUE ACT OF 1978

(Mr. ULLMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

● Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, on July 27, 1978, the Committee on Ways and Means ordered favorably reported to the House H.R. 13511, the Revenue Act of 1978, with amendments. The bill provides a 1979 tax reduction of approximately $16 billion for individuals and corporations, including substantial tax relief for middle-income taxpayers, homeowners, and small businesses, and significant tax incentives for capital formation.

I take this occasion to advise my Democratic colleagues as to the nature of the rule that I will request for consideration of H.R. 13511 on the floor of the House. The Committee on Ways and Means specifically instructed me to request the Committee on Rules to grant a modified open rule which would provide for:

First. The following five amendments, which would not be subject to amendment, if printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and if offered on the floor:

An amendment by Mr. KEMP to the individual tax rate reductions contained in title I of the bill;

An amendment by Mr. FISHER in the nature of a substitute for the reported bill, if such substitute conforms to the conceptual framework of the substitute offered by Mr. FISHER in committee;

An amendment by Mr. CORMAN in the nature of a substitute for the reported bill, if such substitute conforms to the conceptual framework of the substitute offered by Mr. CORMAN in committee;

An amendment by Mr. VANIK and Mr. PICKLE in the nature of a substitute for the reported bill, if such substitute conforms to the conceptual framework of the substitute offered by Mr. VANIK and Mr. PICKLE in committee; and

An amendment in the nature of a substitute for the reported bill embodying the text of H.R. 12078 which is the administration's original tax reform and reduction proposal;

Second. Pro forma amendments to said amendments for purposes of debate (on said amendments) only;

Third. Committee amendments, which would not be subject to amendment;

Fourth. Four hours of general debate, to be equally divided;

Fifth. Waiving all necessary points of order; and Sixth. One motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

I anticipate that H.R. 13511 will be officially reported to the House and the committee report filed on Friday, August 4, 1978. It is our intention to request a hearing before the Committee on Rules as expeditiously as possible.●

PLIGHT OF THE CYPRIOT PEOPLE

(Mr. AUCOIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the House will vote on whether to lift the arms embargo to Turkey. This is an issue of extreme importance and considerable complexity.

At the center of the issue is a concern for the basic human rights of the people of Cyprus. John S. Marandas, a Portland, Oreg., attorney and a member of the National Conference of Christians and Jews' board of directors, has written a comprehensive treatise on the plight of the Cypriot people.

This report contains vivid documentation of the very real situation on Cyprus, a situation that must be confronted in voting on the lifting of the arms embargo.

I commend this paper, titled "An American Perspective of the Legal, Moral and Human Rights Crisis on the Island of Cyprus," to my colleagues before they cast their vote on this crucial issue:

AN AMERICAN PERSPECTIVE OF THE LEGAL, MORAL, AND HUMAN RIGHTS CRISIS ON THE ISLAND OF CYPRUS

(By John S. Marandas)

I. INTRODUCTION

Cyprus is the third largest island in the Mediterranean with an area of 3,572 square miles. It lies in the northeastern corner of the east Mediterranean basin at the meeting point of three continents—Europe, Asia and Africa. This fact added considerably to the island's importance and development through the ages. The island has a population of 650,000 (mid 1973) of which 530,000 (82%) are Greeks and 120,000 (18%) are Turks. The language of the overwhelming Greek Cypriot majority is Greek and their religion Greek Orthodox. The language of the Turkish community is Turkish and its religion Moslem.

II. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

A. Pre-nineteenth century

Since its early stages, Cyprus had an adventurous history, which was the result mainly of its geographical position. It appeared for the first time in the history of civilization in the 6th millennium B.C. during the Neolithic Period. This period which occupies three millenniums is followed by the Bronze Age that lasted until 1500 B.C. when, for the first time the Mycenaean Greeks came to Cyprus as merchants and emigrants. A little later on, in the 13th century B.C. the Achaean Greeks arrived and settled in Cyprus; they introduced the Greek language and culture both of which have been preserved until today. At the end of the 4th century B.C. Cyprus became part of the Kingdom of Alexander the Great. During the first century B.C. it became a province of the Great Roman Empire and remained as such until the 4th century A.D. when it was attributed to the Eastern part of the Roman Empire. This marks the beginning of the Byzantine Period, which lasted until the 12th century A.D. when, during the crusades, King Richard, Coeur de Lion, conquered the island. He then handed it over to Guy de Lusignan who established a French dynasty that lasted to the end of the 15th century. In 1480 Cyprus became part of the Republic of Venice until 1571 when it was conquered by the Ottomans. It remained part of the Ottoman Empire until 1878 when it was sold to Great Britain.

B. Nineteenth century

In 1878 the expansionist policy of Tsarist Russia led the Turks to cede Cyprus to Britain which promised to help Turkey in the event of an attack by Russia on certain bordering provinces. The Turco-British agreement was concluded in disregard of the wishes of the Greek Cypriot people, who had been demanding incorporation of their island to the rest of the Greek trunk.

C. Twentieth century

1. British Colony

On the outbreak of the First World War, Cyprus had been annexed to the British Empire, and in 1925 it had formally been declared a British Crown Colony. By that time, Turkey had, under the Treaty of Lausanne of 1923, Article 16, renounced any right or title over Cyprus and by Article 27 of the same Treaty divested itself of the exercise of any power or jurisdiction in political, legislative, or administrative matters over the nationals of Cyprus. When Cyprus was declared a British Crown Colony, the Turkish population of the island—descendants of members of the Turkish occupation force and expatriated from Turkey—had been invited to choose between repatriation to Turkey or permanent settlement in Cyprus, and a number of them had elected to remain in Cyprus.

2. Anti-Colonial Struggle

In 1950 the Greek Cypriots indicated by near unanimous vote their desire to seek union with Greece after a plebiscite. In 1955, after a constant but unsuccessful struggle to attain their freedom by peaceful methods, the people of Cyprus took up arms against the colonial power. The United Kingdom Government, in its effort to thwart aspirations for self-determination, used the presence in Cyprus of the Turkish minority, and even sought assistance from Turkey itself in obstructing the trend of events in Cyprus. After some hesitation in defiance of its undertaking under the Treaty of Lausanne, the Turkish Government accepted the invitation to intervene in Cyprus. Thus, a portion of the Turkish minority in Cyprus became the instrument of the United Kingdom which threatened that if self-determination were ever to be applied in Cyprus the result would be the partition of the island. The Turkish minority would be offered the right of self-determination separately. That threat might have been intended to discourage the Cypriot people's struggle; but its consequences became an objective of Turkish foreign policy, and a number of Turkish Cypriots took arms against the Cypriot freedom fighters, while the Turkish leadership advocated either partition or the continuation of United Kingdom colonial rule.

3. London and Zurich Agreements of 1959

According to the terms of these agreements Cyprus was to become an independent republic where Britain would have two military bases over which she would maintain sovereign rights. Greece and Turkey were also to maintain small military contingents (950 Greeks and 650 Turks) on the island. The three powers guaranteed the independence of, and respect for the constitution of the new republic. The three powers undertook to consult each other in the event of a breach of the threaty, but each reserved the right to act unilaterally to defend the treaty provisions. The agreements sought to recognize and preserve constitutionally a distinction between the two communities.

4. The Constitution

On the basis of the agreements a constitution was drafted and Cyprus was proclaimed an independent State on August 16, 1960. The constitution provided for under the agreements had divided the people into two communities on the basis of ethnic origin.

In addition, although Turkish Cypriots constituted only 18 percent of the population, they had a right to these positions: 30 percent of the civil service, 30 percent of seats in the Parliament and 40 percent of the police and the army; the Vice-President of the Republic who had to be a Turkish Cypriot was granted veto rights on various vital matters.

Any modification of the Electoral Law and the adoption of any law relating to municipalities or any fiscal laws required separate simple majorities of the Greek and Turkish members of the House could defeat a bill voted by 35 Greek members and 7 Turkish members.

There were created separate Greek and Turkish Communal Chambers with legislative and administrative powers in regard to educational, religious, cultural, sporting and charitable matters, co-operative and credit societies.

Separate municipalities were provided for Greeks and Turks in the five largest towns of the island.

5. Treaties

Two treaties agreed upon in Zurich affected the independence of the Republic of Cyprus:

(1) The Treaty of Guarantee between Cyprus on the one hand and Greece, the United Kingdom and Turkey on the other, whereby the said three powers were given the right of joint or even unilateral intervention for the purpose of re-establishing the state of affairs created by the London and Zurich Agreements, and

(2) The Treaty of Alliance between Cyprus, Greece and Turkey entitling Greece and Turkey to station contingents of their own forces on the Cyprus soil. (It should be noted, however, that these treaties were never presented to the Cyprus House of Representatives for ratification, as the House would not ratify them and thus an impasse would have been created.)

6. Postindependence

In November, 1963, the President of the Republic suggested thirteen amendments to the Constitution. Those amendments had been submitted to the leaders of the Turkish minority in Cyprus; but before the latter had a chance to consider them, the Turkish Government—to which they had been communicated simply for information—had dismissed them as unacceptable thus compelling the Turkish Cypriot leadership to follow suit. In December, 1963, there had been a more ominous reaction from the Turkish Government—the rebellion against the State launched by the Turkish underground organization in Cyprus, and threats of invasion by Turkey itself.

7. London Conference/U.N. Mediation

In January 1964, in view of the serious situation resulting from the fighting in Cyprus, the threats and acts of intervention and aggression from outside and the forcible movements of population, the United Kingdom Government had called a conference in London to deal with the problem. But a few days after the conference had started it had become clear that its purpose was to persuade the Cyprus Government to agree to the dispatch to Cyprus of troops from various countries friendly and allied to Britain and Turkey; but the representatives of Cyprus had opposed that plan and all similar plans submitted to them. To avoid foreign intervention Cyprus brought the matter before the United Nations. To do so, it had had to resist pressure brought to bear from several quarters. At one point, it had even been told that an appeal to the Security Council would be sufficient reason for Turkey to invade Cyprus. During the entire period the threat of Turkish invasion had been constant, with Turkish military aircraft flying over Cyprus, and Turkish war material and trained officers and men clandestinely landed on the island. All these culminated in the bombing by Turkish jets of Cypriot villages and towns in August, 1964. The number of people killed or injured and the damage caused was considerable. (It was in 1964 and again in 1967 that U.S. President L. B. Johnson warned Turkey against invasion.)

The United Nations has been continuously involved in the Cyprus problem since 1964 both in the Security Council and in the General Assembly. In March, 1964, under Security Council Resolution 186 (1964), a U.N. Peace Force was sent to the island (originally for three months, but following separate extensions, it is still on the island), to help restore peace and normal conditions. Mediators were appointed by the Secretary General to study the question and make recommendations as to its solution.

The Mediator stated that the problem of Cyprus could not be resolved by attempting to restore the situation which existed before December, 1963, but that a new solution must be found which must be consistent with the provisions of the United Nations Charter. In particular, he recommended that the solution must be capable of satisfying the wishes of the majority of the population and at the same time of providing for the adequate protection of the legitimate rights of all the people. This report, which was prepared after Turkey proposed partition of 40% of Cyprus, was rejected by Turkey; this had brought mediation efforts to an end.

8. Cyprus at the United Nations

The United Nations repeatedly dealt with the Cyprus problem. On December 18, 1965, the General Assembly passed a Resolution in which it inter alia said:

"Take cognizance of the fact that the Republic of Cyprus as an equal member of the United Nations, is, in accordance with the Charter, entitled to and should enjoy full sovereignty and complete independence without any foreign intervention of interference;

"Calls upon all States, in conformity with their obligations under the Charter, and in particular article 2, paragraphs 1 and 4, to respect the sovereignty, unity, independence and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus and to refrain from any intervention directed against it;

"Recommends to the Security Council the continuation of the United Nations mediation work in conformity with the resolution of March 1964 (S/5575)."

In June, 1968, following recommendations by the U.N. Secretary-General, talks started between the Greek Cypriots and the Turkish Cypriots to find a solution to the Cyprus problem; but the Turkish aim appeared to be the promotion of the island's partition. No progress was achieved in the intercommunal talks.

Following the Secretary-General's call, the Cyprus Government proceeded unilaterally with normalization measures expecting similar gestures on the part of the Turks. But their reply was to announce further division by establishing on December 29, 1967, a Turkish Cypriot Provisional Administration in the areas under their control. Intercommunal talks continued, but without substantial progress during the 1968–73 period.

During the six years, the intercommunal talks were carried out with the understanding that settlement of the island's constitutional problems would be based on the context of the unitary, independent and sovereign state. This was mentioned by the United Nations Secretary-General and it was repeatedly declared at U.N. sessions. Turkey did not object but let it be understood that it fully agreed with this notion.

By February, 1974, Turkey was going through a government crisis. As a result, the coalition government of the Republican People's Party with the National Salvation Party under Premier Bulent Ecevit, signed a protocol in which it declared that only federation could be accepted in Cyprus.

9. The Greek Junta

The leaders of the military junta who took power in Greece in April, 1967 found Cyprus a political embarrassment. (It has been suggested that tension between Greece and Turkey at that crucial stage would mean the transfer of Greek army units to the north of Greece to confront Turkish troops.)

The military junta in Athens viewed President Makarios as a dangerous element, a leading member of the non-aligned bloc. There were fears that Cyprus would become a Cuba of the Mediterranean. General Grivas "exiled" to Greece after 1967 somehow managed to "escape" surveillance and returned to Cyprus to set up EOKA B, a fanatic body with two aims (a) to destroy President Makarios and (b) to achieve Enosis, physical union with Greece which most Cypriots realized was neither feasible nor viable as President Makarios had stated publicly.

After Grivas's arrival in Cyprus in 1971 a reign of terror followed in which government installations were attacked and President Makarios had to set up a Special Reserve Force to combat the extremists.

When President Makarios talked about self-determination, Enosis or any link with Greece, whether with a democratic Government or a military junta, he had expressed the cultural, traditional and religious affinities of two countries. Since 1959, he had seen the implications of a physical attachment of the island of Cyprus, logical though it might seem in human terms, with that of Greece and realized that it was not feasible.

10. Separatist System of Government

The Turkish Cypriots with encouragement if not compulsion by Turkey had all along been trying to promote a solution to the problem aiming ultimately at the island's division. This was sought by proposals for direct partition or for federation envisaging removal of populations and the setting up of two distinct administrations. The Turkish aims came into the open in July-August, 1974, when Turkey invaded Cyprus and immediately afterwards started implementing its long prepared plans for partition and annexation to mainland Turkey.

11. Events of 1974

July 2, 1974: President Makarios writes a letter to President Ghizikis of Greece asking for the withdrawal of Greek officers in the Greek Contingent and National Guard who are plotting against him. Meanwhile the Council of Ministers passes a bill for a reduction in the forces of the National Guard, in an effort to de-fuse a militaristic situation which had continued for 10 years.

July 15, 1974: Military coup de'etat against President Makarios staged by Greek National contingent officers and Greek officers of the National Guard as well as members of EOKA B. Makarios escapes to Paphos and then flies to London via Malta. Nicos Sampson installed as President.

July 17, 1974: News blackout in all eastern regions of Turkey, two journalists arrested in Mersin for trying to send out news of troop movements.

July 18, 1974: Premier Ecevit of Turkey makes visit to London for discussions with other 'guarantor power'—Britain.

July 20, 1974: Turkey using the coup'd etat of July 15, 1974, invaded Cyprus as a 'guarantor' of the independence of Cyprus. U.N. Security Council resolution calls for ceasefire and recognition of sovereignty of Cyprus.

July 23, 1974: Military junta falls in Athens. Democratic government under Constantine Karamanlis installed. Sampson is removed in Cyprus and Glafkos Clerides, as President of the House of Representatives, undertakes duties as acting President according to the Constitution. UNFICYP (U.N. Forces) announce local ceasefire.

July 23–30: Turkey, which had said it had intervened in Cyprus to restore constitutional order does not keep ceasefire but doubles the territory captured in the Kyrenia district. 25,000 Cypriots are made homeless.

July 30, 1974: The Foreign Ministers of Britain, Greece and Turkey meet in Geneva and sign a Declaration on Cyprus.

July 30–August 9: Delineation of a ceasefire line by U.N. experts. UNFICYP and the Cyprus National Guard confronted by advancing Turkish Army.

August 9–August 13: Geneva Conference on Cyprus attended by British Foreign Secretary, James Callaghan; Greek Foreign Minister George Mavros; Turkish Foreign Minister Turan Gunesh, Cyprus Acting President Glafkos Clerides and representative of the Turkish Cypriots, Rauf Denktash.

August 13, 1974: Turkey in Geneva issued an ultimatum—the acceptance immediately of one of two Turkish plans, both based on Turkish administration of 34% of the territory of Cyprus. Clerides and Mavros asked for 36 hours for discussions with their governments. Gunesh refused.

(Callaghan remarked that 36 hours grace was reasonable and that all diplomatic avenues had not been fully explored. He accused Gunesh of being unreasonable. The result was the breakdown of the conference in the early hours of August 14, 1974.)

August 14, 1974: Second Turkish military offensive to capture by force what Turkey had asked for at Geneva—plus extra territory bringing the total to 40%.

August 16: Turkey does not hold the ceasefire she had suggested for 1800 hours local time. Turkish army eventually stopped at a line called in Ankara the Attila Line. (This is in fact the line suggested to the U.N. Mediator in 1965 by Turkey.)

Intercommunal negotiations had once again started between Clerides and Denktash, inaugurated by Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim on a visit to Cyprus, and on:

February 10, 1975: Clerides was to hand over Greek Cypriot proposals for the solution of the Cyprus problem. Denktash called off the meeting but the proposals are still sent through the U.N.

February 13: Rauf Denktash proclaims the setting up of the Turkish Federal State of Cyprus.

12. Recourse to the United Nations

During its 29th Session the U.N. General Assembly adopted unanimously Resolution 3212 which provided the framework for a solution to the Cyprus problem. In its key provisions it calls for the respect of the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and non-alignment of the Republic of Cyprus, for the speedy withdrawal of all foreign armed forces from the Republic, the cessation of all foreign interference, and for the taking of urgent measures for the return of the refugees to their homes in safety.

The Resolution of the General Assembly was endorsed by the Security Council in its Resolution 361/1974 of 13 December, 1974, thus, its implementation is made mandatory.

13. Turkish Non-Compliance

Turkey, however, although one of the countries voting for the Resolution had been following an attitude of disregard of and non-compliance with any of the provisions of the resolution. There has been no withdrawal of troops and no indication of intention to do so; there have been no measures for a return of the refugees to their homes.

Turkey continues to ignore completely the 1949 Geneva Conventions, its international obligations for the respect of Human Rights and all relevant Resolutions of the United Nations. June 8, 1975 in collaboration with the Turkish-Cypriot leadership, Turkey promoted a "referendum" in the occupied part of the Republic of Cyprus. The referendum established a new constitution.

The provisions of the constitution provide in its preamble, that the "Turkish-Cypriot community constitutes the inseparable part of the Great Turkish Nation". That the constitution aims at linking the occupied part with Turkey becomes clear from the affirmation of the members of the Assembly to respect the "principles of Ataturk" and not the principles of the Constitution of Cyprus. The document in all relevant provisions calls the members of the Turkish-Cypriot population as "Turkish citizens".

Another feature of the above constitution is the fact that the Greek Cypriots, together with all non-Turkish communities in the territory under occupation by Turkey, are defined as "aliens". They will not enjoy the fundamental human and political rights, as the Turks, since the rights of the "aliens" are left to be determined by a special law for "aliens". Further, the ownership rights of Greek-Cypriots are not protected. On the contrary, the constitution contains such provisions which application presupposes the expropriation and allocation of property belonging to Greek-Cypriot displaced persons, such as houses, fields, factories, hotels etc. to Turkish Cypriots and Turks from Turkey. (The Turkish-Cypriot leadership also enacted a "Law" for the distribution of bounty to the Turks.)

III. THE TURKISH INVASION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES

A. Refugees

200,000 Greek Cypriots and 80,000 Turkish Cypriots were expelled from over 142 villages and from the towns Famagusta, Kyrenia and Morphou; 5,000 families lost their breadwinner; one child in 125 has become an orphan. By June, 1977, of the total 200,000 only 51,666 persons (26%) had been given acceptable accommodation in newly built settlements. For 65,403 (33%) housing was unsatisfactory because it lacked fundamental facilities, while 55,934 (23.2%) were housed in a very unsatisfactory accommodation (makeshift sheds) and 25,485 (12.8%) in extremely unsatisfactory accommodations.

B. Dead and missing

4,000 Greek Cypriots including civilians, (including old men, women and children) were killed during the Turkish invasion, while another 2,100 are still missing.

Most of these persons are not missing in action but, according to indisputable evidence, they were arrested by Turkish soldiers or armed Turkish Cypriot civilians acting under the directions of the Turkish army after the fighting was over. Almost half of the people listed as missing were unarmed civilians taken from their homes or the places where they had run for refuge. Many of the missing were detained by the Turks in prisons in Turkey or Cyprus or in concentration camps well after the cessation of the hostilities.

The number of 2,100 Greek Cypriots—out of a population of 530,000-missing after hostilities which lasted only for few days represents a figure out of proportion to any other military operation. (The case of 800 missing Americans in Vietnam related to a war which lasted for 8 years.)

Many missing persons are still alive in the hands of the Turkish army well after the hostilities. The Turkish side has been persistently refusing to cooperate and accept suggested procedures for the tracing of the missing through humanitarian organizations.

The Turkish side has been insisting that no Greek-Cypriots are held. Yet on a few occasions when the Turkish side had to accept U.N. and ICRC (International Committee of the Red Cross) representatives, unannounced visits to places resulted in the finding of several Greek-Cypriots who were imprisoned in the Turkish occupied areas.

The question of missing persons was raised at the 3rd round of the Inter-Communal talks in Vienna in the presence of the U.N. Secretary-General; and, it was agreed mutually to extend full facilities for searches in response to information given.

The Turkish side flatly refused to implement this agreement.

On the application of the Cyprus Government the Third Committee of the U.N.O. (Human Rights Commission) discussed the problem of the missing persons at length during its session in November, 1975, and then referred it to the General Assembly, which on 9–12–75 adopted Resolution No. 3450.

C. Economic consequences

Thousands of people lost all their means of subsistence, homes, jobs, property and had to rely on the state for their economic survival. The level of unemployment at the end of 1974 reached unprecedented heights being 24.5% of the economically active population as opposed to only 1.2% in 1973.

Another problem that has been tormenting not only the enclaved Greek Cypriots but also the mass of the Turkish Cypriots is that an enclaved person can only cultivate the fields next to his house. (The majority of the enclaved are farmers, stockbreeders and fishermen.) The survival of the enclaved Greek Cypriots depends exclusively on assistance sent to them through the U.N.

Percentages of privately owned lands are as follows:

| | Percent |
|---|---|
| Greek Cypriots | 82.7 |
| Turkish Cypriots | 16.7 |
| Others | 0.6 |

The average per capita income in Cyprus was, according to World Bank (1974) figures, $1,180 (compared to $370 in Turkey, $240 in Egypt, $810 in Yugoslavia). The 40% of the island captured by Turkey had the highest per capita income except for the capital.

The refugees in Cyprus came from the most developed area of the island, and cover all strata of society. The occupied part of Cyprus represents 70% of production from all sources.

D. Housing

50,000 homes were destroyed. Over one-third of all housing is under Turkish control. Temporary housing for nearly 200,000 refugees had to be constructed, while 67,468 housing units were available in the Turkish occupied areas.

67,468 housing units of 289,661 rooms means 2.4 rooms are available for every Turkish Cypriot in the North.

E. Health services

Two out of six major hospitals are occupied by the Turkish army.

Eight out of 17 rural health centers are occupied.

A most difficult task faced by public and private health services is the provision of medical care to the 200,000 displaced persons of all ages. This is especially true since 82% of the population is being serviced by the six hospitals and nine health centers.

F. Effects on education

34.6% of school buildings occupied or affected.

41.1% of primary school children displaced.

34.6% of school buildings occupied or affecting 29.7% of pupils.

(The whole Greek Cypriot population (82%) has been forced to concentrate in 60% of the country, and use 65.4% of the school buildings.)

G. Violations of human rights

Turkey has violated basic human rights by its aggression in Cyprus. In its report, the European Commission of Human Rights of the Council of Europe has found Turkey guilty of such violations as civilian murders, looting, rape, destruction, expulsion, and brutal behavior of Turkish military personnel. The London Sunday Times of January 23, 1977, published excerpts of the damaging report and stated: "It is a horrendous indictment against Turkey and its soldiers and civilians sent from the mainland".

Groups such as Amnesty International and ASME Humanitas of West Germany have documented other violations such as the torture of Greek Cypriot prisoners of war and the forcible expulsion of Greek Cypriots from the Turkish occupied sector. (See Amnesty International Briefing Paper on Turkey, April, 1977, and London Sunday Times, March 7, 1976).

ASME—Humanitas, on May 5, 1977, after an extensive investigation on the whole island, revealed the following extensive violations of human rights.

"In particular we wish to refer to the following violations:

(a) In the island a considerable number of persons are being deprived of their property, homes, and means of livelihood due to the restrictions of freedom of movement resulting from the policy of the authorities controlling the northern part of Cyprus.

(b) The population in the North faces great difficulties because of lack of security for their lives and property.

(c) The conditions of life of the Greek Cypriots in the North are particularly oppressive as they are deprived of their basic human rights. We established these facts on visiting the Karpass-Area and talking to many persons on May 3rd, 1977.

In particular—

(1) They are deprived of the freedom of movement and trade.

(2) They live under permanent fear for their life and property because of continuous harassment by the mainland Turks and lack of protection.

(3) They are deprived of secondary education and of sufficient elementary school facilities.

(4) They are deprived of proper medical services.

(5) They are not allowed to look after their fields freely and in many cases not even at all.

(6) Homes and other properties are often the object of theft and the people themselves are being beaten and generally inhumanly treated.

(7) The problems of the population in the north are becoming greater because of the attitude of the mainland Turks who have settled there in thousands. We received many complaints of many crimes and atrocities committed by the mainland Turks against the population of the north, both Greek-Cypriots and Turkish-Cypriots, without being punished.

(8) We believe that the presence of an army in this area is one of the main causes for the bad living-conditions and the human suffering which continues in this island.

We hope that this Press Conference will help the situation because having seen many Turkish Cypriots we believe that they themselves, being victims of the situation, should try to come to an understanding with the Greek Cypriots for a quick solution of all humanitarian problems in the interest of the population of Cyprus as a whole."

The following violations include evidence derived by the European Commission of Human Rights of the Council of Europe:

(Turkish defense to violations found by the Commission: None offered, but jurisdiction challenged. By letter dated November 27, 1975, Turkey told the Commission it refused to accept the Greek-Cypriot administrations' right to go to the Commission, "since there is no authority which can properly require the Turkish government to recognize against its will the legitimacy of a government which has usurped the powers of the state in violation of the constitution of which Turkey is a guarantor".)

1. Physical

a. Breaking into homes and robbing: In some areas this has been a general, routine feature, from which few houses escape. Even old men and women living alone and cripples have not been spared.

b. Murders: There is substantial evidence of violations of Article 2, that killings took place on a substantial scale. There were two mass killings at Palekythron where 30–40 soldiers on each occasion, after having surrendered, were shot dead and burned so as to leave no evidence. Civilians holding children, shepherds, and elderly were murdered.

c. Rapes and Threatened Rapes: Many cases of rapes have been reported. The cases of threatened rapes are numerous. This method was particularly used to expel the Greek Cypriots from villages.

A mentally-retarded girl of 24 was raped in her house by 20 soldiers. When she started screaming they threw her from the second-floor window. She fractured her spine and was paralyzed.

One day after their arrival at Voni, Turks took girls to a nearby house and raped them.

One woman from Voni was raped on three occasions by four persons each time. She became pregnant.

One girl, from Palekythron who was held with others in a house, was taken out at gunpoint and raped.

d. Torture: The Commission of Human Rights concluded that prisoners were in a number of instances physically ill-treated by Turkish soldiers. By their severity they constitute "inhuman treatment" in the sense of Article 3 of the Human Rights Convention, for which Turkey is responsible under the convention.

Evidence to Commission: Main witness was a schoolteacher, one of 2,000 Greek Cypriot men deported to Turkey. He stated that he and his fellow detainees were repeatedly beaten after their arrest, on their way to Adana (in Turkey), in jail in Adana and in prison camps at Amasya.

On ship to Turkey—"That was another moment of terrible beating again. We were tied all the time, I lost the sense of touch. I could not feel anything for about two or three months. Every time we asked for water or spoke we were being beaten."

Arriving at Adana—"... then, one by one, they led us to prisons, through a long corridor ... Going through that corridor was another terrible experience. There were about 100 soldiers from both sides with sticks, clubs and with their fists beating every one of us while going to the other end of the corridor. I was beaten at least 50 times until I reached the other end."

In Adana anyone who said he wanted to see a doctor was beaten. "Beating was the agenda every day. There were one or two very good, very nice people, but they were afraid to show their kindness, as they told us."

e. Harassment: Knocking on doors during the night, firing in the air and throwing stones at houses as a means of harassment in the middle of the night, in order to terrorize the Greek Cypriots are widely adopted.

f. Searching of houses: Turkish Police search the houses of the Greek Cypriots and ask them to produce documents of ownership of their belongings, such as cookers, heaters, radios, etc., and seize the items in respect of which such documents cannot be produced.

2. Psychological

a. Denial of Education: The refusal of Turks to allow teachers to go to the Turkish occupied areas, as envisaged by the Vienna III Agreement, aims at denying education to Greek Cypriot children for the fourth year in succession. Also no textbooks were allowed to go to the occupied area.

Education in the occupied areas has virtually been non-existent since the invasion. The only exception is the rudimentary functioning of elementary schools at Rizokarpasso and Ayia Trias. The Ayia Trias elementary school has been operating with only one enclaved school mistress.

The Greek Gymnasium at Rizokarpasso has been used as elementary school for the children of Turkish colonists who have settled at Rizokarpasso. Furthermore, one of the buildings of Ayia Trias elementary school is now being used for the children of settlers. One of the rooms has been turned into a mosque.

The denial to the enclaved of educational opportunities is an indirect oppressive measure of the Turkish Cypriot Administration aiming at forcing the enclaved population to apply for transfer to the free areas for the sake of their children's education. This measure has so far produced the results expected by the Turkish Cypriot leadership, because many people have applied for and have been transferred to the free areas for the sake of their children's education.

b. Denial of Medical Services: The refusal of the Turks to allow doctors and priests to go to the Turkish occupied area to serve the Greek Cypriots, as envisaged by the Vienna III Agreement, serves the same purpose of forcing the Greek Cypriots out.

Turkish Cypriot doctors visit once a week the villages where there are enclaved persons. A general practitioner and a dentist visit the enclaved at Rizokarpasso every Tuesday and Thursday. However, those of the enclaved who need further medical treatment and must, therefore, go to Famagusta, need a permit from the local Turkish Cypriot Police, which is not always granted. In all cases one has to be accompanied by a Turkish Cypriot policeman.

c. Denial of Religious Freedom: The army of Turkey has systematically destroyed churches and has pillaged and burned significant antiquities. The complete 100 page UESCO report detailing the destruction and desecration of the churches has been suppressed. However, John Fielding, a correspondent for Britain's Thames Television and the Manchester Guardian confirmed the findings of UNESCO, prepared by Jasques Dalibard, an authority on religious works of art, and recited on May 8, 1976:

"We visited 26 former Greek villages. Only four churches in the 26 could be described as being in decent condition. We found not a single undesecrated graveyard.

"In some instances, an entire graveyard of 50 or more tombs had been reduced to pieces of rubble no larger than a matchbox.

"En route, in the mountans to the south we found the chapel of Ayios Demetrios at Ardhana empty but for the remains of the altar plinth, and that was fouled with human excrement.

"At Syngrasis, the church interior was smashed beyond recognition, littered with the remains of icons, pews, and beer bottles. The broken crucifix was drenched in urine. At Ayios Yeoryios, north of Famagusta, the church tower was apparently in the process of demolition, with one of its four pillars knocked away. The roof was holed and windows smashed.

"At Lefkoniko, the church furniture was piled outside in the rain, and half a dozen icons were strewn across the rubble in the churchyard. One of the churches in Limnia was utterly wrecked. In a corner lay a stinking pile of household refuse.

d. Restriction of Movement and Communication: The enclaved are not allowed to move from village to village or go behind the limits of their village without a written permit from the Turkish Cypriot police, but even this is granted only for certain areas and for a limited radius round the village.

A curfew is imposed from 9 o'clock in the evening to 6 o'clock in the morning and enclaved persons who were taken prisoner by the Turks have to report to the Turkish Cypriot "Police Station" of their village every Thursday.

As a result of the restrictions on their movement, the enclaved cannot carry out their farming operations or meet even their most elementary social needs. This is another measure of indirect pressure on the enclaved to leave the occupied area, despite the Turkish Cypriot leadership's claim that applications are submitted voluntarily.

e. Colonization: In defiance of international law, and in order to colonize as soon as possible the Turkish occupied areas by Turks imported from Turkey and not to leave Greek-Cypriots in such areas (in conformity with the declared policy of "homogeneous regions"), the Turkish leadership has acknowledged that the Greek Cypriots are leaving their homes not of their own free will.

In some areas, Greek Cypriot enclaved people were forced to leave to make room for the Turks who were transplanted there, in implementation of the plan of Turkey to change the demographic structure of the occupied region, as a next step to eventual partition. While the world public opinion was urging the parties in the Cyprus dispute to abstain from any action likely to prejudice the efforts to reach a settlement, Ankara launched and consequently intensified a plan for the colonization of the occupied areas with emigrants from the Turkish mainland. The plans of Turkey in this respect provide for the transfer of 200,000 emigrants from poor provinces of Anatolia and Black Sea coastal areas to the occupied areas of Cyprus.

The Los Angeles Times said in a recent article that about 20,000 Turkish settlers live in the Famagusta area.

The publication also refers to the problems created in the occupied north as a result of the presence of the Turkish settlers.

It shows that the different cultural and social level of the settlers has given rise to many problems which have led to conflicts with the local Turks, an increase in crime and an aggravation of the unemployment and production problems.

The Turkish Cypriot daily Halkin Sesi wrote, for example, that the settlers from Turkey were "lawless, unemployed and illiterate wanderers . . . who engage in stealing and plundering".

Tercuman of Istanbul reported that the Turkish settlers were "thieves, pickpockets, professional prostitutes and people with criminal records".

A report by the Swedish U.N. contingent said "a lot of incidents" occurred between the settlers and the local population.

The problems become more acute because the settlers are being given preferential treatment by the administration both as regards employment and housing.

There has been a steady influx of mainland Turks to the occupied areas of Cyprus since February, 1975. Initially the settlers were variously described as families of Turkish soldiers, "seasonal workers" and Turkish Cypriots returning to their homeland.

f. It is now estimated that the total number of mainland Turks settled in the occupied area is approximately 40,000.

The first settlers were given the citrus groves of Famagusta, Morphou and Lapithos/Karavas. They moved into the homes and orchards of the evicted Greek Cypriot population.

Their presence worsened the unemployment situation in the north. And although they were described as "agricultural workers", the result has been that the occupied area imported more than 3 million dollars worth of fresh fruits and vegetables from Turkey last October.

IV TURKEY VIOLATES AMERICAN LAWS, AGREEMENTS, TREATIES AND U.N. RESOLUTIONS.

A. U.S. Foreign Assistance Act of 1961:

"Defense articles and defense services to any country shall be furnished solely for internal security, for legitimate self-defense."

The Rule of Law Embargo Amendment—620x states that any assistance to Turkey violates the existing provisions of amendment 620x to the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, which imposes a rule of law embargo on arms transfers to Turkey until Turkey is in compliance with American laws because of Turkey's violation of the Act in illegally using U.S. supplied arms for aggression in Cyprus and for the continuing occupation of 40% of Cyprus.

B. U.S. Foreign Military Sales Act:

"Any country which hereafter uses defense articles or defense services furnished such country . . . in substantial violation of sections 2311–2320 of this title or any agreements entered into pursuant to any of such Acts shall be immediately ineligible for further assistance." (Emphasis supplied. (22 U.S.C.A. Sec. 2314(d).)

The U.S. Congress voted repeatedly in the fall of 1974 to impose a Rule of Law arms embargo on Turkey. The arms embargo finally went into effect on February 5, 1975. The Administration submited a new bill, a few weeks later, to lift the Rule of Law arms embargo. The Administration bill was defeated on July 24, 1975, despite extraordinary Administration lobbying efforts. Turkey on July 25, 1975, unilateraly abrogated its 1969 base agreement with the U.S.

C. U.S. International Security Assistance and Arms Export Control Act:

International Security Assistance and Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C.A. Sec. 2304) arms transfers of Turkey are in direct violation of the human rights provision of the Act which states in part that:

"No security asistance may be provided to any country the government of which engages in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights."

D. U.S.-Turkey Bilateral Agreements:

U.S.-Turkey Bilateral agreements under the U.S. Foreign Assistance and Military Sales Acts were violated by use of U.S.-supplied equipment for aggression against Cyprus.

E. U.S.-Turkey Base Agreements of 1969:

Turkey illegally terminated in July, 1975, the U.S.-Turkey bases agreement.

F. NATO Charter.

The Turkish invasion of Cyprus violated the fundamental principles of the NATO Charter, as expressed in the Preamble and Article 1. The Preamble to the NATO Treaty states:

"The parties of this Treaty reaffirm their faith in the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and their desire to live in peace with all peoples and all governments.

"They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law.

"They seek to promote stability and well-being in the North Atlantic area."

Article 1 of the NATO Charter states:

"The Parties undertake, as set forth in The Charter of the United Nations, to settle any international dispute in which they may be involved by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security and justice are not endangered and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purpose of the United Nations."

G. United Nations Charter:

Article 3 provides that only peaceful means are now the only acceptable methods for settling international disputes.

H. United Nations General Assembly Resolutions: Violations by Turkey include:

1. Resolution of 18 December, 1965; which called for:

(a) Recognition of Security Council resolutions adopted in 1964 and 1965;

(b) Recognition and respect by all nations in conformity with their obligations under the Charter to respect the sovereignty, unity, independence and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus; and

(c) Refraining from any intervention in Cyprus.

2. Resolution No. 2734, which stated that the territory of a nation shall not be the object of military occupation resulting from the use of force.

3. Resolution No. 3212, (November 1, 1974, by 117 to 0 vote), which called for:

(a) Withdrawal of foreign troops from Cyprus;

(b) Allowance of refugees to return to their homes;

(c) Cessation of foreign interference;

(d) Recognition of the sovereignty of Cyprus.

4. Resolution No. 3220, (November 14, 1974), which stated that information on those who are missing or have died should not be delayed.

5. Resolution No. 3395, (November 14, 1974), which called for:

(a) Reaffirmation of Resolution 3212;

(b) Resumption of meaningful negotiations;

(c) Refraining from changes in the demographic structure of Cyprus.

6. Resolution of 12 November, 1976, which called for:

(a) Reaffirmation of Resolutions 3212 and 3395;

(b) All parties to cooperate with the Secretary-General.

7. Resolution No. 3450, which called for:

(a) Informing families in Cyprus about missing relatives;

(b) Joint efforts between the U.N., the Commission on Human Rights and the International Committee of the Red Cross.

I. United States Security Council Resolutions: Violations by Turkey include:

1. Seven U.N. Security Resolutions in 1964–1965, which:

(a) Created a peace keeping force;

(b) Called for restraint in use of armed force, and maintenance of the territorial integrity of Cyprus.

2. Resolution of July 20, 1974, (#353), which:

(a) Respected the sovereignty of Cyprus;

(b) Called for cessation of fighting, and an end to foreign military personnel on Cyprus.

3. Resolution of July 23, 1974, (#354), which called for immediate compliance with Resolution No. 353.

4. Resolution of August 1, 1974, (#355), which acknowledged the sovereignty of the Republic of Cyprus.

5. Resolution of August 14, 1974 (#357), which

(a) Calls for a ceasefire; and

(b) Reaffirmed Resolution 353.

6. Resolution of August 15, 1974, (#358), which:

(a) Insisted upon full implementation of prior resolutions;

(b) Sought immediate and strict observance of the ceasefire.

7. Resolution of August 15, 1974, (#359), which:

(a) Deplored that U.N. members had been killed and wounded;

(b) Called for cooperation with the U.N. Forces.

8. Resolution of August 16, 1974, (#360), which:

(a) Recorded formal disapproval of unilateral military actions taken by Turkey against Cyprus;

(b) Urged immediate withdrawal without delay of Turkish personnel;

(c) Called for meaningful negotiations.

9. Resolution of August 30, 1974, (#361), which:

(a) Called on Turkey to insure fundamental human rights for every person;

(b) Urged the parties to allow the return of refugees to their homes in safety.

10. Resolution of December 13, 1974, (#365), which:

(a) Reaffirmed Resolutions 3212 and 3295;

(b) Extended the U.N. Peace-Keeping Force.

11. Resolution of March 12, 1975, (#367), which:

(a) Condemned the Turkish declaration that a part of Cyprus would become a federated Turkish state;

(b) Called upon all nations to refrain from attempting to partition the island or seek unification with any other country.

12. Resolution of December 13, 1975, (#383), which:

(a) Reaffirmed its decision to maintain a U.N. Force in Cyprus;

(b) Reaffirmed Resolution 3212.

J. Geneva Cease Fire Agreement of July 30, 1974, was violated by Turkey.

K. Cease Fire Declaration of August 16, 1974, was violated by Turkey.

L. Treaty of Guarantee, guaranteeing the sovereignty of the Republic of Cyprus, respecting its territories integrity, and prohibiting union or partition of the island, was violated by Turkey.

M. Treaty of Alliance, wherein Turkey, Greece and Cyprus were to cooperate in the defense of Cyprus, and to undertake to resist any attacks or aggression against the independence and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus, was violated by Turkey.

N. International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1966, by not allowing inhabitants of the occupied territories, who had previously fled or expelled to return to their homes, was violated by Turkey.

O. European Convention on Human Rights: The European Commission on Human Rights of the Council of Europe has found Turkey guilty of violating six articles of the European Convention on Human Rights including systematic killings of innocent civilians committed on a substantial scale, rapes, torture of prisoners and persons detained, looting and robbing on an extensive scale, continuing violation of human rights by refusing to allow the return of refugees to their homes, and enforced expulsions.

A Guardian news article of January 18, 1977, and the London Sunday Times of January 23, 1977, published excerpts of the damaging report. The Sunday Times detailed the Commission's verdicts that Turkey had violated six articles of the European Convention on Human Rights by its:

(1) Systematic killings of innocent civilians committed on a substantial scale;

(2) Rapes of women of all ages from 12 to 71;

(3) Torture of prisoners and persons detained;

(4) Looting and robbing on an extensive scale;

(5) Continuing violation of human rights by refusing to allow the return of refugees to their homes;

P. Geneva Convention of 1949: The Turks have illegally transferred impoverished mainland Turks to the island in a policy of deliberate forced colonization, a violation of the Geneva Convention IV, Article 49 which prohibits an occupying power from transferring part of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies, as well as the reverse.

Q. Vienna Agreement of August 2, 1975: The forced expulsions of over 18,000 Greek Cypriots from the north contrary to the Vienna Agreement signed on August 2, 1975, is summed up by the Senate Subcommittee on Refugees report, Crisis on Cyprus, 1976: Crucial Year for Peace.

R. London Agreements of 1959 relating to the founding of Cyprus, were violated by Turkey.

S. The Montreaux Convention of 1936, was violated by Turkey.

T. The 1955 Convention on the Continental Shelf, was violated by Turkey.

U. Lausanne Treaty of 1923. Articles 37 through 41 were violated by Turkey.

V. Helsinki Agreements of 1975, were violated by Turkey.

W. United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, was violated by Turkey.

X. Geneva Declaration on Cyprus of July 30, 1974, was violated by Turkey.

V. CONCLUSION

A recent volume of the U.S. Congressional Record carries statements on Cyprus made by Senator KENNEDY.

Senator KENNEDY's statement reads:

"Mr. President, for tens of thousands of Cypriots, being a refugee has become a way of life. Thousands still live in tents and countless more are crowded into temporary, inadequate housing. Over three years have now passed since the Turkish invasion of Cyprus and not a single refugee has been able to return to his home or lands a few miles away.

"The continuing tragedy of Cyprus has tended to slip from our view, as the Cyprus crisis has been overtaken by newer problems in new areas. But fortunately, articles occasionally appear in our press which serve to remind us that the Cyprus problem continues, unchanged and that we cannot forget the plight of the Cypriot people.

"Such an article appeared in today's New York Times by William Farrell, describing the life of the Cypriot refugees in the small town of Kolossi. It captures what life is like as a refugee in one's own country—with one's home and fields only a short distance away, but blocked by an army of occupation.

"Mr. President, we cannot forget the refugees of Cyprus, even as we cannot ignore the problem of Cyprus, because they represent more than just a humanitarian problem or a political issue. More than anything else, Cyprus is a moral issue which we can ignore at our peril. As a recent editorial in The Guardian of London stated:

"'For all the intricacies of Cyprus, the essential issues are moral ones.

"'Can a country invade another under the West's nose and get away with it? Is might right? And, if might is not right, what are we going to do about it'." (Emphasis ours.)●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and to include therein extraneous material on the bill, H.R. 12514, the foreign assistance authorization bill for fiscal year 1979, which was considered by the House earlier today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 10929

Mr. PRICE submitted the following conference report and statement on the bill (H.R. 10929) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons and for research, development, test, and evaluation for the Armed Forces, to prescribe the authorized personnel strength for each active duty component and the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces and for civilian personnel of the Department of Defense, to authorize the military training student loads, to authorize appropriations for civil defense, and for other purposes.

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. No. 95–1402)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 10929) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons and for research, development, test and evaluation for the Armed Forces, to prescribe the authorized personnel strength for each active duty component and the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces and for civilian personnel of the Department of Defense, to authorize the military training student loads, to authorize appropriations for civil defense, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1979".

TITLE I—PROCUREMENT

TITLE II—RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, TEST, AND EVALUATION

SEC. 201. Funds are hereby authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 for the use of the Armed Forces of the United States for research, development, test, and evaluation, as authorized by law, in amounts as follows:

For the Army, $2,661,701,000.

For the Navy (including the Marine Corps), $4,504,268,000.

For the Air Force, $4,164,500,000, of which $10,000,000 may be obligated and expended only for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Airborne Warning and Control System (AWACS) program, but such $10,000,000 may not be obligated or expended until at least one member country of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (other than the United States) enters into a contract to purchase the AWACS aircraft.

For the Defense Agencies, $933,400,000, of which $27,600,000 is authorized for the activities of the Director of Test and Evaluation, Defense.

EXTREMELY LOW FREQUENCY (ELF) COMMUNICATION SYSTEM

SEC. 202. None of the funds authorized to be appropriated by this Act for the development of the Extremely Low Frequency (ELF) communication system may be obligated or expended for the development of such system unless the President certifies to the Congress in writing that the use of funds for such purpose is in the national interest, that a site has been selected for the deployment of such system, and that the President has approved such site for the deployment of such system, and in no event may any of the funds authorized to be appropriated by this Act be used for full scale development or construction of another test-bed facility for an Extremely Low Frequency (ELF) communication system.

REPORT RELATING TO DEVELOPMENT OF SURVIVABLE LAND-BASED INTERCONTINENTAL BALLISTIC MISSILE SYSTEM

SEC. 203. The Secretary of Defense shall, not later than September 30, 1978, report to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives the decision of the executive branch regarding full scale development of a survivable land-based intercontinental ballistic missile system. In the event that no final decision regarding such matter has been reached by the executive branch by such date, the Secretary of Defense shall—

(1) notify such committees on or before such date that no final decision has been reached and the reasons why such decision has not been made;

(2) inform such committees of the technical, political, or other considerations necessitating a delay in making such decision;

(3) indicate the date the Secretary believes a final decision will have been made with respect to such matter; and

(4) submit a report to such committees once every 30 days on the status of the decision on such matter (including in each such report information relating to the matters contained in clauses (2) and (3) of this section) until a final decision by the executive branch has been made and such committees have been informed of such decision.

REPEAL OF FISCAL YEAR 1978 AWACS RESTRICTION

SEC. 204. Section 201 of the Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1978 (Public Law 95-79, 91 Stat. 323), is amended by striking out ", but such $15,700,000 may not be obligated or expended until at least one member country of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (other than the United States) enters into a contract to purchase the AWACS aircraft".

TITLE III—ACTIVE FORCES

SEC. 301. For fiscal year 1979, each component of the Armed Forces is authorized an end strength for active duty personnel as follows:

(1) The Army, 775,800.

(2) The Navy, 523,550.

(3) The Marine Corps, 190,000.

(4) The Air Force, 566,400.

TITLE IV—RESERVE FORCES

SEC. 401. (a) For fiscal year 1979, the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces shall be programmed to attain an average strength of not less than the following:

(1) The Army National Guard of the United States, 362,200.

(2) The Army Reserve, 195,750.

(3) The Naval Reserve, 87,000.

(4) The Marine Corps Reserve, 33,000.

(5) The Air National Guard of the United States, 92,150.

(6) The Air Force Reserve, 53,075.

(7) The Coast Guard Reserve, 11,700.

(b) The average strength prescribed by subsection (a) of this section for the Selected Reserve of any Reserve component shall be proportionately reduced by (1) the total authorized strength of units organized to serve as units of the Selected Reserve of such component which are on active duty (other than for training) at any time during the fiscal year, and (2) the total number of individual members not in units organized to serve as units of the Selected Reserve of such component who are on active duty (other than for training or for unsatisfactory participation in training) without their consent at any time during the fiscal year. Whenever such units or such individual members are released from active duty during any fiscal year, the average strength prescribed for such fiscal year for the Selected Reserve of such Reserve component shall be proportionately increased by the total authorized strength of such units and by the total number of such individual members.

EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FOR ENLISTED RESERVES

SEC. 402. (a) Section 2132(b)(1) of title 10, United States Code, relating to eligibility for educational assistance, is amended—

(1) by striking out "automatically extended by two years" and inserting in lieu thereof "not less than six years"; and

(2) by striking out "eighth anniversary" and inserting in lieu thereof "last day of the term".

(b) Section 2135 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by striking out "1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "1980".

REENLISTMENT BONUS FOR MEMBERS OF SELECTED RESERVE

SEC. 403. (a) Subsection (a) of section 308b of title 37, United States Code, relating to reenlistment bonuses for members of the Selected Reserve, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) An enlisted member of a reserve component who—

"(1) has completed less than ten years of total military service; and

"(2) reenlists or voluntarily extends his enlistment for a period of three years or for a period of six years in a designated military skill, or in a designated unit, as determined by the Secretary concerned, in the Selected Reserve of the Ready Reserve of an armed force; may be paid a bonus as provided in subsection (a).".

(b) Subsection (b) of such section is amended by inserting "an amount not to exceed" before "$450", before "$900", and before "$150".

(c) Subsection (g) of such section is amended by striking out "1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "1980".

BONUS FOR ENLISTMENTS IN THE SELECTED RESERVE

SEC. 404. (a) Chapter 5 of title 37, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 308b the following new section:

"§ 308c. Special pay: bonus for enlistment in the Selected Reserve

"(a) Any person who, after September 30, 1978, enlists in the Selected Reserve of the Ready Reserve of an armed force for a term of enlistment of not less than six years, is a graduate of a secondary school and has never previously served in an armed force may be paid a bonus as provided in subsection (b).

"(b) The amount and method of payment of a bonus to be paid under subsection (a) shall be determined in accordance with regulations prescribed under subsection (c), except that the amount of such bonus may not exceed $2,000 and—

"(1) one-half of the bonus shall be paid upon completion of the initial active duty for training of such person; and

"(2) the remainder of the bonus may be paid in periodic installments or in a lump sum, as determined by the Secretary concerned.

"(c) This section shall be administered under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense for the armed forces under his jurisdiction and by the Secretary of Transportation for the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy.

"(d) A member who fails to participate satisfactorily in training with his unit during a term of enlistment for which a bonus has been paid to him under this section shall refund an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount of the bonus which has been paid to him as the unexpired part of such term of enlistment bears to the total length of such term of enlistment.

"(e) The Secretary of Defense shall submit a report to the Congress every three months stating the number of members of the Selected Reserve of the Ready Reserve who at the time of such report are serving a term of enlistment for which a bonus has been paid under this section and listing each unit of the Selected Reserve of the Ready Reserve to which any such member is assigned at the time of such report. The first such report shall be made not later than December 31, 1978.

"(f) No bonus may be paid under this section to any enlisted member who, after September 30, 1980, enlists in the Selected Reserve of the Ready Reserve of an armed force.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of such chapter is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 308b the following new item:

"308c. Special pay: bonus for enlistment in the Selected Reserve.".

RESTRICTION ON TRANSFER FROM READY RESERVE TO STANDBY RESERVE

SEC. 405. (a)(1) Section 269 of title 10, United States Code, relating to transfers from the Ready Reserve, is amended—

(A) by striking out "eligible to transfer" in subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "transferred";

(B) by striking out the colon at the end of the third sentence in subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof a period;

(C) by striking out subsection (e) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(e) Subject to subsection (g) and under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense, and by the Secretary of Transportation with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy, a member in the Ready Reserve may be transferred to the Standby Reserve."; and

(D) by striking out subsection (f) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(f) A Reserve who is qualified and so requests may be transferred to the Retired Reserve under regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned and, in the case of the Secretary of a military department, approved by the Secretary of Defense.".

(2) The amendments made by paragraph (1) shall not apply with respect to a member of the Ready Reserve of an Armed Force who served on active duty (other than for training) before the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) Section 271 of such title, relating to continuous screening of the Ready Reserve, is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" before "Under regulations";

(2) by striking out "significance" in clause (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "significant"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Defense, and by the Secretary of Transportation with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy, any member of the Ready Reserve who is designated as a member not to be retained in the Ready Reserve as a result of screening under subsection (a) shall, as appropriate, be transferred to the Standby Reserve, discharged, or, if such member is eligible and applies therefor, transferred to the Retired Reserve.".

(c)(1) Section 511(b) of such title, relating to terms of enlistments in Reserve components, is amended—

(A) in the first sentence—

(i) by striking out "the Secretary concerned" and inserting in lieu thereof "the Secretary of Defense, and by the Secretary of Transportation with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy"; and

(ii) by striking out "sections 451–473 of title 50, appendix" and inserting in lieu thereof "the Military Selective Service Act (50 U.S.C. App. 451–473)"; and

(B) in the second sentence—

(i) by inserting "not less than" in clause (1) before "two years" and by adding "and" at the end of such clause;

(ii) by striking out clause (2); and

(iii) by redesignating clause (3) as clause (2) and striking out "Standby Reserve" in such clause and inserting in lieu thereof "Ready Reserve".

(2) The amendments made by paragraph (1) shall not apply with respect to a person who enlisted as a Reserve for service in the Armd Forces under section 511(b) of title 10, United States Code, before the date of the enactment of this Act.

(d)(1) Chapter 37 of such title, relating to general service requirements, is amended by adding after section 651 the following new section:

"§ 652. Ready Reserves: requirement of notification of changes of status.".

"Under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Defense, and by the Secretary of Transportation with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy, each member of the Ready Reserve who is not a member of the Selected Reserve shall notify the Secretary concerned of any change in such member's address, marital status, number of dependents, or civilian employment and of any change in such member's physical condition which would prevent him from meeting the physical or mental standards prescribed for his armed force.".

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of such chapter is amended by adding after the item relating to section 651 the following new item:

"652. Ready Reserves: requirement of notification of changes of status.".

REPEAL OF REQUIREMENT FOR ANNUAL REPORT ON RESERVE FORCES

SEC. 406. (a) Section 664 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by striking out subsection (c).

(b)(1) Section 279 of such title is repealed.

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 11 of such title is amended by striking out the item relating to section 279.

TITLE V—CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

SEC. 501. (a) for fiscal year 1979, the Department of Defense is authorized an end strength for civilian personnel of 1,005,500.

(b) The end strength for civilian personnel prescribed in subsection (a) of this section shall be apportioned among the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy (including the Marine Corps), the Department of the Air Force, and the agencies of the Department of Defense (other than the military departments) in such numbers as the Secretary of Defense shall prescribe. The Secretary of Defense shall report to the Congress within sixty days after the date of the enactment of this Act on the manner in which the initial allocation of civilian personnel is made among the military departments and the agencies of the Department of Defense (other than the military departments) and shall include the rationale for each allocation.

(c) In computing the authorized end strength for civilian personnel there shall be included all direct-hire and indirect-hire civilian personnel employed to perform military functions administered by the Department of Defense (other than those performed by the National Security Agency), whether employed on a full-time, part-time, or intermittent basis, but excluding special employment categories for students and disadvantaged youth such as the stay-in-school campaign, the temporary summer aid program and the Federal junior fellowship program and personnel participating in the worker-trainee opportunity program. Whenever a function, power, or duty, or activity is transferred or assigned to a department or agency of the Department of Defense from a department or agency outside of the Department of Defense, or from another department or agency within the Department of Defense, the civilian personnel end strength authorized for such departments or agencies of the Department of Defense affected shall be adjusted to reflect any increases or decreases in civilian personnel required as a result of such transfer or assignment.

(d) When the Secretary of Defense determines that such action is necessary in the national interest, he may authorize the employment of civilian personnel in excess of the number authorized in subsection (a) of this section, but such additional number may not exceed 1¼ percent of the total number of civilian personnel authorized for the Department of Defense by subsection (a) of this section. The Secretary of Defense shall promptly notify the Congress of any authorization to increase civilian personnel strength under the authority of this subsection.

TITLE VI—MILITARY TRAINING STUDENT LOADS

SEC. 601. (a) For fiscal year 1979, each component of the Armed Forces is authorized to average military training student load as follows:

(1) The Army, 50,738.
(2) The Navy, 57,996.
(3) The Marine Corps, 21,324.
(4) The Air Force, 44,410.
(5) The Army National Guard of the United States, 11,793.
(6) The Army Reserve, 5,959.
(7) The Naval Reserve, 991.
(8) The Marine Corps Reserve, 3,074.
(9) The Air National Guard of the United States, 2,471.
(10) The Air Force Reserve, 1,184.

(b) In addition to the number authorized for the Army in subsection (a), the Army is authorized a military training student load for fiscal year 1979 of not less than 17,205 to be utilized solely for One Station Unit Training.

(c) The average military training student loads for the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Air Force and the Reserve components authorized in subsection (a) of this section for fiscal year 1979 shall be adjusted consistent with the manpower strengths authorized in titles III, IV, and V of this Act. Such adjustment shall be apportioned among the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Air Force and the Reserve components in such manner as the Secretary of Defense shall prescribe.

REDUCTION OR REALIGNMENT OF THE TRAINING BASE

SEC. 602. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no action may be taken to effect or implement any substantial reduction of the training base (as defined in subsection (c)) or any substantial force structure realignment of the training base planned as a part of the fiscal year 1979 Defense manpower program unless and until the provisions of subsection (b) are complied with.

(b) No action described in subsection (a) with respect to a substantial reduction or realignment of the training base may be taken unless and until—

(1) the Secretary of Defense or the Secretary of the military department concerned notifies the Committees on Armed Services and Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives in writing of the specific reduction or realignment proposed;

(2) the Secretary of Defense or the Secretary of the military department concerned certifies that such reduction or realignment is in the best interest of the national security and provides for the most cost effective and efficient management of the training base, in time of peace and in ability to meet mobilization requirements; and

(3) a period of thirty legislative days expires following the date on which the notification and certification referred to in clauses (1) and (2) have been submitted to such committees, during which period no irrevocable action may be taken to effect or implement such reduction or realignment.

For the purpose of clause (3), a legislative day is a day in which either House of Congress is in session.

(c) For the purposes of this section, the term "training base" means the composite of installations, posts, camps, stations, and bases that have as a primary or secondary mission the conduct of formal entry level, advanced individual, or specialty training.

TITLE VII—CIVIL DEFENSE

AUTHORIZATION FOR DEFENSE CIVIL PREPAREDNESS AGENCY

SEC. 701. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the programs of the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency for fiscal year 1979 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950 the sum of $96,500,000.

CIVIL-DEFENSE STUDY

SEC. 702. (a) From the funds authorized to be appropriated pursuant to section 701 of this Act, the sum of $200,000 shall be used for a study of the special defense needs of areas of the United States which contain significant elements of the United States strategic nuclear retaliatory forces or significant defense-related research laboratories or facilities.

(b) The study provided for in subsection (a) shall include the following:

(1) An identification of areas of the United States which, because they contain significant elements of the United States strategic nuclear retaliatory forces or significant defense-related research laboratories or facilities, are prime targets in case of a nuclear attack.

(2) A determination of what civil defense evacuation and shelter plans and warning systems are now available or are proposed to be made available to such areas.

(3) An evaluation of the effectiveness of such existing evacuation and shelter plans and warning systems.

(4) A determination of the feasibility of establishing more effective evacuation and shelter plans and warning systems for such areas and a determination of the potential costs and methods of financing such plans and systems.

(5) A detailed analysis of the specific effects of a nuclear attack on each such area.

(6) A determination of the need for educating, and the most effective methods of educating, the public in such areas on civil defense matters.

(c) The study required by this section shall be completed, and copies shall be filed with the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives, before April 1, 1979.

TITLE VIII—GENERAL PROVISIONS

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY FOR SPECIAL PAY FOR HEALTH PROFESSIONALS

SEC. 801. (a) The second sentence of section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act to amend chapter 5 of title 37, United States Code, to revise the special pay structure relating to medical officers of the uniformed services", approved May 6, 1974 (88 Stat. 96; 37 U.S.C. 302 note), is amended to read as follows: "The authority for the special pay provided by the amendments made by the first section of this Act shall expire on September 30, 1980.".

SEC. 805. (a) Section 3040(b) of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after the first sentence thereof the following new sentence: "The Assistant Surgeon General is Chief of the Dental Corps and is responsible for making recommendations to the Surgeon General and through the Surgeon General to the Chief of Staff on all matters concerning dentistry and the dental health of the Army.".

(b) (1) Chapter 307 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3081. Dental Corps: Chief, functions

"(a) The Chief of the Dental Corps shall be an officer of that corps appointed as prescribed in section 3040 of this title.

"(b) Under such regulations as the Secretary of the Army may prescribe, all dental functions of the Army shall be under the direction of the Chief of the Dental Corps. All matters relating to dentistry shall be referred to the Chief of the Dental Corps.

"(c) The Chief of the Dental Corps shall—

"(1) establish professional standards and policies for dental practice;

"(2) initiate and recommend action pertaining to organization requirements and utilization of the Dental Corps and dental auxiliary strength, appointments, advancement, training assignment, and transfer of dental personnel; and

"(3) serve as the advisor to the Office of the Surgeon General on all matters relating directly to dentistry.

"(d) Under such regulations as the Secretary of the Army may prescribe, dental and dental auxiliary personnel throughout the Army shall be organized into units commanded by a designated Dental Corps officer. Such officer will be directly responsible to the commander of installations, organizations, and activities for all professional and technical matters and such administrative matters as may be prescribed by regulation.".

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 307 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"3081. Dental Corps: Chief, functions.".

(c) (1) Chapter 807 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 8081. Assistant Surgeon General for Dental Services

"There is an Assistant Surgeon General for Dental Services in the Air Force who is appointed by the Secretary of the Air Force upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General from officers of the Air Force above the grade of major who are designated as dental officers under section 8067(b) of this title. The term of office of the Assistant Surgeon General for Dental Services is four years but may be increased or decreased by the Secretary of the Air Force.".

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 807 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"8081. Assistant Surgeon General for Dental Services.".

CEILING FOR PAYMENTS TO PHYSICIANS UNDER CHAMPUS

SEC. 806. (a) (1) Section 1079 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h) Payment of a charge for physician services for which a claim is submitted under a plan contracted for under subsection (a) may be denied because the charge is in excess of a predetermined charge level based upon customary charges made for similar services in the same locality only to the extent that such charge is in excess of the charge level that, on the basis of statistical data and methodology acceptable to the Secretary of Defense, in consultation with the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, is equivalent to the 90th percentile of the customary charges made for similar services in the same locality during the last preceding calendar year elapsing before the start of the twelve-month period (beginning July 1 of each year) in which the claim for the payment is submitted.".

(2) Section 1086 of such title is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) The provisions of section 1079(h) of this title shall apply to payments for physician services under a plan contracted for under subsection (a).".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) shall apply with respect to claims submitted for payment for services provided on or after the first day of the first calendar year beginning after the date of enactment of this Act.

"(5) the Commandant of the Marine Corps.";

(4) striking out subsection (c); and

(5) redesignating subsections (d) and (e) as subsections (c) and (d), respectively.

ASSIGNMENT OF WOMEN TO NAVAL VESSELS

SEC. 808. The last sentence of section 6015 of title 10, United States Code, relating to restrictions on the assignment of women members of the Navy, is amended to read as follows: "However, women may not be assigned to duty on vessels or in aircraft that are engaged in combat missions or may they be assigned to other than temporary duty on vessels of the Navy except hospital ships, transports, and vessels of a similar classification not expected to be assigned combat missions.".

MILITARY TRAINING FOR FEMALE UNDERGRADUATES AT MILITARY COLLEGES

SEC. 809. (a) The Secretary of Defense shall require that any college or university designated by the Secretary of Defense as a military college shall, as a condition of maintaining such designation, provide that qualified female undergraduate students enrolled in such college or university be eligible to participate in military training at such college or university, but, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Defense may not require that, as a condition of maintaining such designation or for any other purpose, such college or university require female undergraduate students enrolled in such college or university to participate in military training.

(b) The Secretary of Defense shall prescribe such regulations as the Secretary determines necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this section.

NAVY SHIPBUILDING POLICY

SEC. 810. (a) It is the policy of the United States to modernize the combatant forces of the United States Navy through the construction of advanced, versatile, survivable, and cost-effective combatant ships in sufficient numbers and having sufficient combat effectiveness to defend the United States against enemy attack and to carry out such other missions as may be assigned to the Navy by law. In order to achieve such policy, the Navy should develop plans and programs for the construction and deployment of weapon systems, including navy aviation platforms, that are more survivable, less costly, and more effective than those presently in the Navy.

(b) In order that the Congress may be kept currently informed regarding compliance with the policy expressed in subsection (a), the President shall include in all requests made to the Congress for the authorization of any ship for the combatant forces, including any aircraft carrier, (1) his conclusions with respect to the survivability, cost effectiveness, and combat effectiveness of such ship, (2) a recommendation whether such ship should be nuclear or conventionally powered, and (3) the reasons for such conclusions and recommendations.

(c) Title VIII of the Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1975 (88 Stat. 408), is repealed.

CARRIER SERVICE LIFE EXTENSION PROGRAM AND DDG–2 DESTROYER CONVERSION

SEC. 811. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law and except as provided in subsection (b), the Secretary of the Navy may not take any action with respect to the use of either public shipyards or private shipyards for conversion, overhaul, or repair work under the Service Life Extension Program (SLEP) or under the program for the modernization of DDG–2 class guided missile destroyers, or for the employment of additional personnel for, or the transfer of additional personnel to, any public shipyard as a part of the necessary buildup of manpower for carrying out either such program, until—

(1) the Secretary of the Navy conducts a comprehensive least-cost approach study (A) comparing the costs of carrying out such programs at public shipyards with the costs of carrying out such programs at private shipyards, and (B) evaluating such other factors as the Secretary of the Navy considers should be taken into account in assigning work in connection with the conversion, overhaul, repair, or modernization of vessels to public or private shipyards;

(2) a written report containing the results of such study is submitted, after the date of the enactment of this Act, to the Committees on Armed Services and on Appropriations of the Senate and the House of Representatives; and

(3) a period of sixty days of continuous session of Congress expires following the date on which such report is submitted to such committees.

(b) Nothing in this section shall prevent the Navy from conducting advanced planning or purchasing long lead items in connection with either program described in subsection (a) so long as such planning or purchasing is not related to the performance of work in connection with either such program at any particular shipyard.

(c) For purposes of subsection (a)(3), the continuity of a session of Congress is broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die, and days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of such sixty-day period.

SEA-BASED AIRCRAFT PLATFORM STUDY FUNDS

SEC. 812. The unobligated balance of $40,000,000 authorized to be appropriated in section 201 of the Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1978 (Public Law 95–79; 91 Stat. 323), for conducting comprehensive evaluation studies of sea-based aircraft platforms shall after the date of the enactment of this Act be available and primarily applied toward performing any design work related to any such sea-based aircraft platform authorized by this Act.

CERTIFICATION OF CLAIMS

SEC. 813. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, none of the funds authorized to be appropriated for the Department of Defense by this or any other Act shall be used for the purpose of paying any contract claim, request for equitable adjustment to contract terms, request for relief under Public Law 85–804, or other similar request, which exceeds $100,000 unless a senior company official in charge at the plant or location involved has certified at the time of submission of such contract claim, request for equitable adjustment to contract terms, request for relief under Public Law 85–804, or other similar request, that such claim or request is made in good faith and that the supporting data are accurate and complete to the best of such official's knowledge and belief. The requirements of this section shall not apply to claims, requests for equitable adjustment to contract terms, requests for relief under Public Law 85–804, or other similar requests submitted before the date of enactment of this Act.

RESTRICTION ON CONTRACTING OUT COMMERCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL TYPE FUNCTIONS

SEC. 814. (a) The Secretary of Defense shall submit a report to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives providing the details of any proposed change in policy or regulations, from those in effect before June 30, 1976, regarding the determination of whether commercial or industrial type functions at Department of Defense installations located in any State, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and Guam should be performed by Department of Defense personnel or by private contractors during the period beginning on October 1, 1978, and ending on September 30, 1979.

(b) No commercial or industrial type function at any Department of Defense installation referred to in subsection (a) shall be performed by private contractors unless such contractor performance began before the date of the enactment of this Act or performance would have been allowed by the policy and regulations in effect before June 30, 1976. The prohibition in the preceding sentence shall apply until the end of the sixty-day period beginning on the date the report required by subsection (a) is received by the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives.

PROHIBITION ON SALE OF CERTAIN DEFENSE ARTICLES FROM DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE STOCKS

SEC. 815. (a) Chapter 49 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 975. Prohibition on the sale of certain defense articles from the stocks of the Department of Defense

"(a)(1) Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c), the sale outside the Department of Defense of any defense article designated or otherwise classified as Prepositioned Material Configured to Unit Sets, as decrement stock, or as Prepositioned War Reserve Stocks for United States Forces is prohibited.

"(2) In this section, 'decrement stock' means such stock as is needed to bring the armed forces from a peacetime level of readiness to a combat level of readiness.

"(b) The President may authorize the sale outside the Department of Defense of a defense article described in subsection (a) if—

"(1) he determines that there is an international crisis affecting the national security of the United States and the sale of such article is in the best interests of the United States; and

"(2) he reports to the Congress not later than 60 days after the transfer of such article a plan for the prompt replenishment of the stocks of such article and the planned budget request to begin implementation of that plan.

"(c)(1) Nothing in this section shall preclude the sale of stocks which have been designated for replacement, substitution, or elimination or which have been designated for sale to provide funds to procure higher priority stocks.

"(2) Nothing in this section shall preclude the transfer or sale of equipment to other members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 49 of title 12, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"975. Prohibition on the sale of certain defense articles from the stocks of the Department of Defense.".

ASSISTANCE TO 1980 OLYMPIC WINTER GAMES

SEC. 816. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Defense is authorized—

(1) to provide logistical support and personnel services to the XIII Olympic winter games;

(2) to lend and provide equipment to officials of the Lake Placid Olympic Organizing Committee; and

(3) to provide such other services as the Lake Placid Olympic Organizing Committee may consider necessary and the Secretary may consider advisable.

(b) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Defense for fiscal year 1979 an amount not to exceed $2,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out subsection (a). No funds may be obligated or expended for such purpose unless specifically appropriated for such purpose.

REALIGNMENT OF MILITARY INSTALLATIONS IN THE CANAL ZONE

SEC. 817. None of the funds authorized to be appropriated by this Act shall be used for the realignment of any military installation in the Canal Zone unless such use is consistent with the responsibility of, and necessity for, the United States to defend the Panama Canal or with legislation which may be enacted to implement the Panama Canal treaties of 1977.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO THE LIMITATION ON NUMBER OF ADMIRALS AND VICE ADMIRALS IN THE NAVY AND GENERALS AND LIEUTENANT GENERALS IN THE MARINE CORPS

SEC. 818. (a) The first sentence of section 5231(b) of title 10, United States Code, is amended by striking out "the active list of the Navy" and inserting in lieu thereof "active duty".

(b) Section 5232(b) of such title is amended by striking out "the active list of the Marine Corps" and inserting in lieu thereof "active duty".

COMMISSARY BAGGERS

SEC. 819. Notwithstanding any other provison of law, an individual who performs bagger or carryout service for patrons of a commissary of a military department may not be considered to be an employee for purposes of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 by virtue of such service if the sole compensation of such individual for such service is derived from tips.

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 10929) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons and for research, development, test and evaluation for the Armed Forces, to prescribe the authorized personnel strength for each active duty component and the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces and for civilian personnel of the Department of Defense, to authorize the military training student loads, to authorize appropriations for civil defense, and for other purposes, submit the following joint statement to the House and the Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate amendment struck out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and inserted a substitute text.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate with an amendment which is a substitute for the House bill and the Senate amendment. The differences between the House bill, the Senate amendment, and the substitute agreed to in conference are noted below, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by agreements reached by the conferees, and minor drafting and clarifying (changes.)

TITLE I—PROCUREMENT

AIRCRAFT

ARMY

C–12A (light utility aircraft)

The House recommended $19.6 million for the procurement of 20 C–12 aircraft for the Army. The Senate bill contained no authorization for the C–12.

House conferees argued that this authorization would allow the Army to exercise the fourth of five options to purchase 20 C–12 aircraft per year for five years, and avoid the renegotiations of the existing contract.

Senate conferees were adamant in their position that the Army did not need to acquire additional light utility aircraft this year.

The House recedes.

CH–47C (Chinook)

The House approved the Army request for 16 CH–47C helicopters in the amount of $78.4 million. The Senate deleted the entire request.

House conferees pointed out that the CH–47C is a critical item in worldwide Army combat readiness pending the introduction of the CH–47D through a modernization program.

Senate conferees argued that the CH–47C helicopters in this bill would not incorporate the improvements now being incorporated in the CH–47D's and would have to be returned for modification and upgrade.

The conferees agreed to authorize $33 million for CH–47C helicopters.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

NAVY

A–6E (Intruder)

The House approved $18.2 million for advance procurement for twelve A–6Es fiscal year 1980. The Senate deleted the entire request.

The House took the position that the A–6E is the only all-weather attack aircraft currently in production in the Free World, and that to let the production line close would not be in the best interests of the United States Navy.

Senate conferees argued that the A–6E inventory will be adequate to sustain squadron operating requirements through the mid-1980s because the inventory objective is exceeded with the present procurement.

After much discussion, the Senate conferees prevailed.

The House recedes.

A–7E (Corsair)

The January budget submission did not contain a request for any A–7E aircraft, but it did contain a request for $26.1 million in the procurement account for support of the present A–7E fleet. In view of Navy testimony indicating the need for further A–7E procurement, the House added $144.88 million to the budget request for a total of $170.98 million for the procurement of 24 A–7E's.

The Senate authorized the requested $26.1 million for support but no new A–7E's.

The conferees agreed to authorize $110.4 million for 12 aircraft and support.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

F–14A (Tomcat)

The budget request was for $524 million for 24 F–14A aircraft. The House added $200 million for 12 additional aircraft, bringing the total to 36. The Navy testified that the flyaway cost would increase $3.0 million per copy if the buy for fiscal year 1979 was 24 instead of 36.

The Senate authorized funding for 28 aircraft on the basis that 44 F–14's were funded in fiscal year 1978 and, thus, 28 authorized in fiscal year 1979 would maintain F–14 production at 36 per year.

The Senate recedes.

F–18 (Hornet)

The budget request was $311.9 million for 5 F–18 aircraft and $38.6 million for advanced procurement for 15 F–18 aircraft in fiscal year 1980. Both the House and Senate authorized funding for 9 aircraft in fiscal year 1979 and $85.0 million for advanced procurement for 30 aircraft to be procured in 1980. However, the Senate amendment added $117.6 million to the authorization request and the House added $121.6 million, a difference of $4 million.

The conferees agreed to authorize $429.5 million for 9 F–18 aircraft in fiscal year 1979.

The House recedes.

AV–8A (Harrier)

The House added $90 million for the procurement of 15 AV–8A aircraft in lieu of 18 A–4M's requested for the Marine Corps. The Senate also deleted the authorization requested for A–4M's but did not authorize any AV–8A's.

The Senate conferees pointed out that additional money was justified in the Research and Development account to accelerate the development schedule for the AV–8B and that the conferees could delete the 15 AV–8A's.

The House recedes.

CTX (Navy light utility transport aircraft)

The House bill contained an authorization for $27.4 million for 22 CTX aircraft. The Senate did not authorize these aircraft.

The House conferees were strong in their position that these aircraft were necessary for the modernization of Navy's utility transport fleet. The Senate conferees did not dispute the requirement but expressed concern that Navy had not bought the CTX's authorized last year through open competitive bidding, but used the Military Interdepartmental Purchase Request (MIPR) to contract for the 22 CTX aircraft authorized and funded in fiscal year 1978. The Senate conferees argued that significant savings could still be achieved if the aircraft authorized this year were bought through open competition. However, House conferees pointed out that the House report contained language that these aircraft were authorized with the understanding that the aircraft procured would be common with the light utility aircraft of the Army and Air Force.

After much discussion, the conferees agreed that the aircraft authorized should be procured through open competitive procedures insofar as possible, and without breaching existing contractual commitments.

The Senate reluctantly recedes.

C–9 (Navy transport)

The C–9 aircraft is an aircraft used by the Navy to provide airlift support to the fleet and Naval forces. The budget requested no C–9 authorization; however, the Senate added authorization for $16.1 million for 1 C–9 aircraft for the modernization of the Naval Reserve airlift fleet.

The House recedes.

S–3A (Modification)

The House added $3.0 million for the conversion of 2 existing S–3A anti-submarine warfare aircraft originally used in the R&D flight test program in order to provide a carrier-on-board delivery capability.

The Senate recedes.

AIR FORCE

ATCA (Advanced tanker/cargo aircraft)

The budget contained a request for $143.5 million for 2 ATCA's. The House approved the request.

The Senate expressed concern that further design and engineering effort of the modification and support equipment should be completed before commencing production of the second ATCA and authorized only one.

The House conferees pointed out that such a reduction would result in a minmum total program cost increase of $30 million.

The Senate recedes.

C–130H (Hercules)

There was no request for C–130H aircraft. However, the House added $145 million for 16 C–130H's to prevent further degradation in mission performance of the older C–130's.

The Senate, with the intent of modernizing the Air National Guard, added $77.5 million for 8 C–130H's.

The Senate prevailed in the discussion of the two positions.

The House recedes.

TA–7D (two-place trainer)

The Senate recommended $194.6 million for 21 TA–7D two-place trainer aircraft for the Air National Guard. The House bill contained an authorization of $141 million for 16 of these aircraft.

The Senate conferees pointed out that the Air National Guard is presently building toward an A–7 force of 15 squadrons, in addition to a training squadron, and the Senate authorization would provide each squadron with one trainer and the training squadron with six trainers.

The House conferees concurred with the Senate as to the need for these aircraft by the Air National Guard but insisted on its position since these aircraft were not in the President's budget request.

The conferees expressed concern that the Air Force has not begun the A–7D two-place modification project authorized and funded last year but recognized the project had been underfunded. Therefore, the conferees included funds necessary to complete the project within the authorization for the two-place trainer.

The Senate recedes with an amendment authorizing $145.5 million for 16 aircraft.

E–4 (advanced airborne command post)

The $15 million added by the House was intended to support advance procurement and production engineering work on aircraft 1 through 4. The Senate did not include authorization for this aircraft.

The House conferees pointed out that a lack of procurement funds for fiscal year 1979 would lead to an overall cost increase and a schedule slip and would disrupt present contract agreements.

The conferees agreed on a total of $10 million for this program.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

EF–111 (Modification)

The request was for $161.3 million to modify 5 F–111 tactical attack airplanes into electronic warfare radar jamming airplanes.

The House bill deleted all authorization for the EF–111, citing excessive cost growth in the program and an inadequate number of EF–111 aircraft in the program to adequately perform the mission. The Senate amendment provided the full request.

The conferees agreed to provide $151.3 million for 5 EF–111 modifications.

The House very reluctantly recedes.

KC–135 (Modification)

The House added $9 million to the Air Force aircraft modification account to start KC–135 aircraft reengining. The Senate did not include authorization for this purpose.

The House conferees pointed out that substantial benefits, including energy savings, reduced costs, increased safety and improved mission effectiveness, will be derived from reengining the aircraft.

The Senate recedes.

CRAF (Civil Reserve Air Fleet, modification)

Th House approved the budget request of $68.5 million for the CRAF modification. The Senate approved only $7.5 million.

After receiving the Department of Defense reclama stating that $28.5 million plus $7.5 million approved in fiscal year 1978 would fully fund a pilot program of four aircraft, the conferees agreed on $28.5 million. These funds are authorized only for modification of new production wide-body passenger aircraft.

The House recedes with an amendment.

ALQ–131 (Other production charges)

Included in the category of "Other Production Charges" was a requets of $61.5 million for the ALQ–131 radar jamming pod. The House approved the request but the Senate deleted the entire amount. The Senate rationale was that the delays in the development program on the ALQ–131 has caused the planned contracting date for the fiscal year 1979 procurement to slip into fiscal year 1980.

The House recedes.

MISSILES

ARMY

Hawk

The House bill authorized $94.7 million for procurement of 805 Hawk missiles. The Senate authorized $72.3 million for procurement of 608 missiles.

The House recedes.

Roland

The House bill authorized $200.1 million for initial procurement of 15 fire units and 314 missiles. Due to program adjustments, the Army subsequently determined that $200.1 million would procure only 7 fire units and 157 missiles.

The Senate authorized $99.4 million to fund engineering services and initial production facilities, but deferred initial procurement of fire units and missiles to ensure that all test corrections had been validated before entry into production.

The conferees agreed to authorize $165 million for procurement of 3 fire units and 75 missiles.

Chaparral modifications

The House bill authorized $10 million for Chaparral modifications. The Senate authorized $7.1 million.

The Senate recedes.

TOW modifications

The House bill authorized $.5 million for TOW modifications. The Senate authorized $3.4 million.

The Senate recedes.

TOW missile procurement, Army and Navy

The House and Senate bills authorized $42.3 million for procurement of TOW missiles for the Army and $8.3 million for procurement of TOW missiles for the Navy.

The conferees agreed that the Army should negotiate the buy of TOW missiles in a manner so as to secure as many missiles as possible within the authorized funding level for fiscal year 1979. However, the conferees agreed that the Army should not bind the Congress to future procurements of TOW missiles.

Spares and repair parts (Roland)

The House bill authorized $2.6 million for initial spares for the Roland program.

The Senate contained no authorization for Roland initial spares.

The Senate recedes.

NAVY AND AIR FORCE

Cruise missiles

The Department of Defense request for the fiscal year 1979 cruise missile procurement program totaled $215.0 million, of which $40.1 million was for the procurement of long lead items for the Ground-Launched Cruise Missile (GLCM), and $174.9 million was requested for the Air-Launched Cruise Missile (ALCM). The Department of Defense did not request any funds for long lead procurement of the Sea-Launched Cruise Missile (SLCM) variant. The House bill provided full authorization for the procurement of 36 ALCM's; no authorization for the long lead procurement of the GLCM; and $40.1 million to initiate long lead procurement for the SLCM.

The Senate amendment provided authorization for 24 ALCM's at $156.9 million; $20.0 million for the SLCM; and $40.1 million for the GLCM.

The conferees agreed with the House recommendation that greater emphasis should be placed on procurement of the SLCM in light of the Navy's urgent requirement for a long range anti-ship missile capability. Consequently, the conferees authorized $30.1 million for the SLCM. The House conferees agreed with the Senate position to provide long lead funding authorization for that equipment peculiar to the GLCM in the event that this weapon is selected for use as a theatre tactical nuclear weapon. The conferees recommended an authorization of $20.2 million for the GLCM.

The House recedes to the Senate position to provide $156.9 million for the ALCM.

AIR FORCE

AIM-7F (Sparrow)

The House approved the FY 1979 procurement authorization of $134.9 million for the Sparrow program. The Senate reduced this by $24.7 million and 300 missiles on the basis that the improved Monopulse version of the Sparrow will be ready for production in FY 1980.

The conferees finally agreed on an authorization of $127.1 million for 1500 Sparrow missiles.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

AGM-65A (Maverick)

The House approved the FY 1979 procurement request of $34.5 million for the Maverick missile program. The Senate reduced the request by $7.6 million planned for procurement of missile depot maintenance facility equipment believing the equipment is not needed at this time.

House conferees pointed out that construction to house the equipment was on schedule and the equipment purchase must go forward.

The Senate recedes.

BGM-34C (Remotely piloted vehicle)

The House added $11 million for 3 BGM-34C RPVs. The Senate bill contained no authorization for this program.

House conferees pointed out that authorization for this program is imperative and the addition of $11 million in authorization will insure a timely production program.

The Senate recedes.

Defense support program missile procurement

The House reduced the authorization for the Defense Support Program by $15 million. The Senate authorized the full amount requested. The conferees agreed to this reduction because the Defense Department was unable to justify their full request for fiscal year 1979.

This reduction is not intended as a denial of support for the efforts but rather a deferral.

Trident advance procurement

The House authorized the requested $274.8 million for advanced procurement for future Trident ballistic missile submarines.

The Senate authorized $55 million for this purpose.

The Senate recedes.

CVN-71 nuclear carrier

The House authorized $2,129.6 million for a nuclear aircraft carrier with improved passive protection of the ordnance storage areas.

The Senate authorized $1,930.0 million for a repeat Nimitz-class nuclear aircraft carrier.

The Navy is encouraged to make such changes as can be made within the funds authorized to further decrease the vulnerability of the nuclear aircraft carrier.

The House recedes.

CGN-42 nuclear cruiser

The House authorized $1,096.0 million for full funding of one Aegis equipped nuclear cruiser.

The Senate authorized no funds for this purpose.

The Senate recedes with an amendment providing the authorization of $369 million for advanced procurement only.

There is an urgent need to get the Aegis anti-ship missile defense system to sea.

The Senate conferees reluctantly agreed to authorize long-lead funding for Aegis system components for a nuclear-powered Aegis cruiser, whether the vessel be a new vessel or a conversion of the Virginia class. The House accepted a caveat that the Aegis components should be common to the conventionally-powered DDG-47 system, should it be necessary to interchange the equipment among these ships.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

DDG-2 conversion

The House bill authorized a request of $151 million for advance procurement for conversion of the DDG-2 guided missile destroyer.

The Senate amendment authorized $128 million for this purpose.

The House recedes.

LPH conversion

The Senate amendment authorized $45 million for conversion of one LPH amphibious assault ship to a light carrier.

The House authorized no funds for this purpose.

The conferees note Navy testimony that antisubmarine warfare and mine countermeasure platforms are inadequate. They are concerned that priority be given in evaluating this serious shortage and that the Navy move more rapidly toward providing air-capable platforms for these purposes.

Conversion of one LPH assault ship to a light carrier is authorized at the cost of $45 million. A light carrier will add to the Navy's at-sea air capability and complement existing fleet carriers by being capable of being converted to undertake a variety of missions such as antisubmarine warfare, mine countermeasures operations, presence and amphibious assault.

Before any actual conversion is undertaken, the Secretary of the Navy shall report to the Committees on Armed Services of the House and Senate on the cost and details of the conversion and the advantages and disadvantages of the proposed conversion in sufficient detail to allow the committees to review and further evaluate the conversion. The conversion shall not be undertaken until the expiration of a period of thirty days of continuous session of Congress following the submission of the Secretary's review.

The House recedes.

LHA advance procurement

The Senate amendment authorized $70 million for advance procurement for a sixth LHA amphibious assault ship.

The House authorized no funds for this purpose.

The House recedes.

TRACKED COMBAT VEHICLES

ARMY

M113A1 Armored personnel carrier

The House bill authorized $74.2 million for procurement of 910 M113A1 vehicles. The Senate authorized $44.5 million for procurement of 550 M113A1's.

The House recedes.

M88A1 recovery vehicle

The House bill authorized $73.9 million for procurement of 112 M88A1 tank retriever vehicles. The Senate authorized $51.5 million for procurement of 78 vehicles.

The conferees agreed to authorized $62.7 million for procurement of 95 M88A1's.

M60A3 tank production

The House bill authorized $382.4 million for procurement of 480 M60A3 tanks. The Senate authorized $190.4 million for procurement of 240 tanks.

The conferees agreed to authorize $343.6 million for procurement of 410 M60A3 tanks.

Infantry fighting vehicle (IFV), XM-3 Cavalry fighting vehicle (CFV)

The House bill authorized $34.6 million for long lead procurement for the Infantry Fighting Vehicle and $4.0 million for long lead procurement for the Cavalry Fighting Vehicle.

The Senate authorized $39 million for long lead procurement for the Infantry Fighting Vehicle only.

The House recedes.

The conferees agreed to defer long lead procurement on the Cavalry Fighting Vehicle without prejudice since that derivative of the IFV had not been justified to the Senate.

The conferees note that this authorization applies only to the Infantry Fighting Vehicle in its present TOW, Bushmaster armored turrent (TBAT-II) configuration. Any derivatives of this basic design are subject to future congressional approval.

Mortar carrier conversion

The Senate authorized $1.4 million to convert 4.2 inch M106A1 mortar carriers to the 81mm M125A1 configuration. The House bill contained no authorization.

The Senate recedes.

M60 modifications

The House bill authorized $147.6 million for modification of M60 series tanks, to include conversion of 500 tanks from the M60A1 to the M60A3 configuration.

The Senate authorized $151.2 million, to include 460 conversions.

Subsequent program developments established that neither program could be fully executed within the fiscal year 1979 funded delivery period. The conferees therefore agreed to authorize $132.4 million for M60 modifications, to include conversion of 380 tanks from the M60A1 to the M60A3 configuration.

Production base support (XM-1)

The House bill authorized $73.4 million for production base support for the XM-1 program. The Senate authorized $58.4 million.

The conferees agreed to authorize $68.4 million.

MARINE CORPS

M60A1 tank

The House bill authorized $19.9 million for procurement of 28 M60A1 tanks. The Senate authorized $17.3 million for the same number of tanks.

The Senate recedes.

TORPEDOES

Mark 48 torpedoes

The House bill authorized $173.4 million for 319 Mark 48 Torpedoes.

The Senate authorized the Administration's request of $110.7 million for 127 Mark 48 Torpedoes.

The conferees agreed on $142.1 million for 223 torpedoes.

The House recedes with an amendment.

Mark 46 torpedoes

The House bill authorized $364.1 million for Mark 46 Torpedo modifications.

The Senate authorized $335.4 million.

The House recedes.

OTHER WEAPONS

ARMY

M198 howitzer

The House bill authorized $26 million for procurement of 107 M198 Howitzers. The Senate authorized $32.1 million for the same number of Howitzers.

The conferees agreed to authorize $28.8 million for procurement of 107 M198 Howitzers.

M2 machine gun

The House bill contained no authorization. The Senate authorized $26.3 million for procurement of 3060 M2 machine guns.

The conferees agreed to authorize $13.2 million for procurement of 1530 M2 machine guns.

NAVY

Mark 15 close in weapons system

The House authorized $114.1 million for 45 systems.

The Senate authorized $58.4 million for 19 systems.

The conferees agreed on $71.1 million for 32 systems. The conferees do not want to interfere with the production line of these systems. Consequently, as much of the $71.1 million as may be needed may be used for long lead time items for next year's planned production.

The House recedes with an amendment.

MARINE CORPS

M198 howitzer

The House bill authorized $21.5 million for procurement of 80 M198 Howitzers.

The Senate authorized $19.3 million for procurement of 60 M198 Howitzers.

The Senate recedes.

TITLE II—RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, TEST AND EVALUATION

GENERAL

The Department of Defense requested authorization of $12,473,412,000 for the fiscal year 1979 Research, Development, Test and Evaluation appropriations. The following table summarizes the Senate and House modifications to the Research and Development budget request:

R.D.T. & E SUMMARY

[In thousands of dollars]

| | Request | House | Senate | Conference |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Army | $2,721,400 | $2,586,215 | $2,727,340 | $2,661,701 |

ARMY

Advanced Multi-Purpose Missile

The Army requested $8.1 million for the development of an advanced missile system as a follow-on to the Tube-launched Optical-tracked-Wire-guided (TOW) missile as a hedge against advances in Soviet tank armor technology. The House bill deleted the entire Army request, while the Senate amendment authorized the full request.

The House conferees emphasized that there was insufficient justification provided by the Department of Defense to proceed with the development of an entirely new missile system as a replacement for the TOW missile. The House conferees remained unconvinced that the Army required or could afford the development of a new system when, in fact, there is a great potential for using a ground-launched Hellfire as a future antitank weapon.

The conferees agreed on an authorization of $1 million to be used only for the ground-launched Hellfire. If it can be shown that the Hellfire is not adequate, a request for reprogramming can be considered.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

Aerial Scout Helicopter

The House bill denied the Army's request for $5.487 million for the Aerial Scout Helicopter Advanced Technology program. The Senate amendment authorized the full amount.

The conferees express concern about the Army's past inability to present an acceptable development plan for an Aerial Scout Helicopter. The conferees expressed concern that the Army may not be able to adequately fund development and procurement of a new helicopter for the aerial scout mission within its future budget priorities, and should, therefore, examine all alternatives. The conferees wish it understood that continued support for this program will depend on developing a program that provides an IOC not later than December 31, 1984.

The House recedes.

Army/Navy SAM

The House bill deleted the full $5.3 million Army request for the Army/Navy Surface-to-Air Missile (SAM) program.

The Senate authorized the full request.

The conferees agreed to delete the Army request with the recommendation that the funded Navy portion of this joint program be fully coordinated with the Army.

The Senate recedes.

Foreign weapons evaluation

The Department of Defense requested $9.0 million for foreign weapons evaluation, $2.7 million for the Army, $2.8 million for the Navy, and $3.5 million for the Air Force. The House bill deleted the entire request and the Senate amendment authorized all $9 million. The conferees agreed to authorize $6.1 million: $2.7 million for the Army, $1.4 million for the Navy, and $2.0 million for the Air Force. The conferees agreed that the Under Secretary of Defense for Development, Research and Engineering (USDDR&E) should exercise more stringent control over these funds. In addition, the conferees suggest that any request for funds for foreign weapons evaluation in the fiscal year 1980 budget be included in a budget for the USDDR&E instead of the service budget requests.

Joint tactical microwave landing system (MLS)

The Department of Defense requested $8.6 million to initiate the development of the MLS in support of the joint Department of Transportation/Department of Defense/NASA National MLS program. The House bill denied the request for funds for this program. The Senate amendment approved authorization for the full request.

The conferees recommended that all authorizations requested by the Department of Defense for the development of a tactical variant of the MLS be denied without prejudice.

The conferees agreed to authorize $3.0 million for continued development of the equipment required to provide compatibility between the Marine Corps Remote Area Approach and Landing (MRAALS) system and the national MLS. Additionally, the authorization is intended to provide for whatever airborne test and evaluation of components and subsystems is required. The authorization is provided in the Other Marine Corps Engineering program element.

The conferees request that the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering submit a plan to the Committees on Armed Services delineating the cost/performance trade-off of developing a national tactical MLS variant relative to the currently available military systems.

TENCAP

The conferees agreed to recommend a reduction of $12.0 million in the TENCAP program. A total of $6.3 million of this reduction should be applied to the Tactical Surveillance System program, terminating the related prototype development effort. The remaining $5.7 million should be allocated by the program manager, with priority given to improving signal intelligance (SIGINT) support to tactical forces.

NAVY

Advanced electronic devices development, surface electro-magnetic and optical systems

The Navy requested $2.089 million for the Advanced Electronic Devices Development program and $7.569 million for the Surface Electro-Magnetic and Optical System program. The House bill deleted the entire authorization request for the Advanced Electronic Devices program and recommended a reduction of $5.2 million from the Surface Electro-Magnetic and Optical Systems program. The Senate amendment provided full authorization for both programs.

The conferees wish to convey to the Navy the necessity for technology exploitation to culminate in operationally deployable systems. Consequently, the conferees agreed to provide authorization to complete the test and evaluation of the joint U.S./Canadian infrared search and track system.

Additionally, the conferees agreed to provide authorization to continue the focal plane array project in support of the development of a forward-looking infrared system.

The total agreed-upon authorization for these two projects is $5.369 million under the Surface Electro-Magnetic and Optical System program. No funds are authorized for the Advanced Electronic Devices program.

Airborne tactical signal exploitation

The conferees agreed to recommend authorization of $600,000 in the Airborne Tactical Signals Exploitation program. Although the requirement for a sea-based signal intelligence (SIGINT) collection capability is valid, the need for a new airborne collector should be examined in the context of existing and programmed national and tactical intelligence assets.

Air-to-ground stand-off weapons

The Navy requested $5.465 million to develop a high-performance, air-to-ground weapon capable of attacking high-value, heavily-defended, land and sea targets. The House bill deleted $3.214 million for this effort and supported only the development of a classified project within the total program. The Senate amendment authorized the full request.

The House recedes to the Senate position with the understanding that the Navy plan will be in consonance with a three-year weapon system development program.

Harpoon

The request is for $2.563 million for improvements on the Harpoon anti-ship missile. The House deleted the entire request; the Senate amendment approved the full request.

The conferees agreed to authorization of $1.5 million for this program, with the understanding that none of these funds shall be used for development of the vertical-launch Harpoon.

Light Airborne Multi-purpose system (LAMPS III)

The Navy requested $124.491 million for the development of the LAMPS III anti-submarine warfare (ASW) helicopter system. The House bill deleted the entire authorization request with the recommendation to terminate the LAMPS III program. The Senate amendment authorized $118.391 million with the recommendation to delete the anti-ship surveillance and targeting mission.

The House conferees expressed the view that the LAMPS III system cost has escalated to the point where the system is too costly for the performance that it will provide. The program acquisition cost of the total LAMPS III system is over $15 million per deployed helicopter in fiscal year 1979 dollars. The addition of realistic inflation estimates increases the program acquisition cost estimate per complete system to over $20 million.

Both the House and Senate conferees concur in the Navy requirement for an ASW helicopter, but also concur that the program has not been properly managed and that there is high potential for substantial cost reductions in the LAMPS III development and procurement program. The Secretary of the Navy, in a letter dated July 17, 1978, advised the conferees of the possibility of realizing nearly a half billion dollars in cost savings through program restructuring that would not degrade the operational capability of the LAMPS III system.

The conferees agreed to authorize $95 million with the expectation that the Navy would not obligate or expend these funds until the Secretary of the Navy advises the Committees on Armed Services that the Navy has restructured the LAMPS III program to effect total program cost savings of a minimum of $400 million below the total program cost of $3.9 billion specified in the Secretary's letter. The restructured program must meet the Navy ASW requirements for the LAMPS III system with a planned Initial Operational Capability (IOC) of not later than calendar year 1984. Upon completion of the above requirements, a request for reprogramming for the additional funds, if any, required for the fiscal year 1979 development effort can be considered.

Light carrier design

The House authorized no funds for this program.

The Senate amendment authorized $25 million to continue design of a Light Carrier.

The conferees agreed to authorize $25 million for design work on a light carrier for aircraft operations in anti-submarine warfare, mine countermeasures, and other such missions as may be found useful. This authorization applies only to the design for a new ship, not for a conversion.

The House recedes.

Navy V/STOL aircraft

The Navy requested $72.4 million in several program elements to support development of basic aircraft technology related to future V/STOL designs and also to pursue V/STOL concept studies and initial development efforts on a subsonic (Type A) V/STOL aircraft.

The House reduced the technology development program and deleted all funds for the Type A aircraft.

The Senate reduced the budget request by a total of $22.4 million but added another $5.5 million for design studies of an AV–8B "Plus," a Naval version of the Marine Corps AV–8B Harrier close air support airplane. The Senate report warned that the evolving realities of the design penalties of V/STOL (as compared with conventional take-off and landing (CTOL) alternate designs) are such as to temper earlier enthusiasm for the V/STOL concept. The Senate did, however, strongly endorse continuation of the Navy's basic study program of the costs, cost effectiveness, and operational concepts of V/STOL

The conferees agreed that the Navy's Sea Based Air Master Study Plan was fundamental to achieving a systematic evaluation of the pros and cons of V/STOL and should be implemented as planned. The conferees also agreed that it is premature for the Navy to commit to a V/STOL hardware development program or to make a choice of starting a Type A or a Type B (supersonic) prototype until the cost effectiveness and operational concepts of V/STOL, as compared to CTOL alternatives, have been thoroughly evaluated. Accordingly, the conferees agreed to provide $7.5 million to support this study and the on-going Thrust Augmented Wing prototype program. In addition, $25.0 million was provided in several other programs elements to support basic aircraft technology developments that are not uniquely related to V/STOL.

The conferees agreed that the AV–8B "Plus" should be included in the overall master study, so that its cost effectiveness and place in the Navy's force structure could be evaluated. The conferees provided $3.0 million to support the AV–8B "Plus" in the master studies and for additional engineering analysis of the aircraft's design and cost.

SIRCS and SEAMOD

The House bill deleted the $14.5 million request for SIRCS and did not authorize SEAMOD.

The Senate deleted $4.9 million for a new missile development from SIRCS and added $7.7 million for SEAMOD although no funds were requested by the Navy.

The conferees agreed to authorize $7.7 million to establish a Combat System Architectural Approach to incorporate elements of SEAMOD, SIRCS, and other programs to meet multimission requirements in a timely and effective manner.

The conferees agreed to delete the total request for the SIRCS program.

Small wetted area twin hulled (SWATH) ship

The House bill provided no funds for this program.

The Senate amendment authorized $7.5 million for study and evaluation of the SWATH ship.

The House recedes with an amendment authorizing $1.0 million for SWATH.

SSBN–X

The Senate initiated a $16 million program to support preliminary design studies of a SSBN which would be mixed with our planned Trident submarine Fleet in the future.

The House bill contained no such funds.

The conferees agreed to authorize $3 million to support preliminary design studies of a high performance, cost-effective, although not necessarily smaller SSBN of the future. The conferees fully support the continued construction of Trident submarines as planned.

Surface effect ship (SES)

The Department of Defense did not request any funds for fiscal year 1979 for the Surface Effect Ship (SES) program. The House bill recommended the addition of $93 million to the Navy's budget request for continued research and development of the SES. The Senate amendment authorized $30 million for SES component development only.

The House conferees emphasized that the SES is the Navy's only high-technology program that could provide a high speed deep water surface ship for the post-1980 period.

The conferees agreed to authorize $80 million for continued SES research, development, test and evaluation. The conferees have been advised that this authorization is adequate to proceed with the development of the 3,000-ton prototype SES during fiscal year 1979.

Within visual range air-to-air missile

The Navy requested $6.047 million and the Air Force $6.1 million to initiate the joint development of a dogfight missile that would eventually replace the current Sidewinder.

The House bill deleted all funds requested for authorization while the Senate amendment provided $1.0 million for the Navy and $1.1 million for the Air Force. The conferees agreed that the formal start of a new missile program was premature and accepted the House position. Additionally, the conferees agreed that this action was made without prejudice to ongoing technology investigations such as the PAVE–PRISM project and that these efforts should be pursued with available basic technology funds.

AIR FORCE

Advanced medium STOL transport (AMST)

The House bill authorized $3 million for the AMST and the Senate amendment authorized $25 million. The conferees agreed to authorize $14 million. The conferees agreed that the funds are to be used to complete source selection for the AMST. In addition, the conferees expect the Secretary of Defense to reevaluate this program. If the Secretary of Defense decides to develop the AMST, the $14 million plus $8 million available from FY 1978 authorizations should be adequate to continue sustaining engineering work until Congress has an opportunity to consider a full-scale development decision.

Air Force Public Affairs Office
Navy test pilot school

The House bill denied authorization of $0.3 million requested by the Air Force for the Public Affairs program and $5.49 million for support of the Navy Test Pilot School.

The Senate amendment provided the full authorization request for both programs.

The conferees agreed that funding for these programs should be provided from the Operations and Maintenance Appropriation account and not from Research, Development, Test and Evaluation funds.

The Senate recedes.

B–1

The House bill denied without prejudice the Air Force request for $105.5 million to continue the B–1 research and development program during fiscal year 1979. The Senate amendment authorized the entire amount.

The House conferees believed that since the Administration had cancelled B–1 production, it was not prudent to spend an additional $296 million through 1983 to determine B–1 effectiveness.

The House conferees agreed with the Senate position that, in the absence of the B–1, the offensive and defensive avionics and other subsystems developed for the B–1 should be fully explored for potential application to the B–52 in as timely a manner as practical. However, the House conferees also insisted that the B–1 be investigated as a potential cruise missile carrier candidate. The Senate conferees agreed to this stipulation.

Conferees for both Houses agreed that approval of any authorization this year did not imply a commitment to continue this program through 1983.

The conferees agreed to authorize $55 million to be used for B–1 research, development, test and evaluation and the collection and analysis of data pertinent to strategic bomber penetration with the understanding that none of the funds will be used for other manned penetrating bomber development conversion or procurement programs.

Engine model derivative

The Air Force requested $2.9 million to develop improved performance variants of existing aircraft engines. The House bill denied the funds for this program, while the Senate amendment authorized the full request.

The conferees agreed to provide $1.0 million and to request the Secretary of Defense to consider transferring into this program the $15 million in unused fiscal year 1977 funds authorized and appropriated for the Navy F–14B reengining project. The $16 million should be made available only for a joint Navy/Air Force development effort for engine model derivatives.

Low-level laser guided bomb

The House bill denied the $2.0 million requested by the Air Force for development of a low-level laser guided bomb. The Senate amendment approved the request.

The conferees recommend that the Air Force use existing production funds to institute engineering changes as necessary to insure the earliest possible operational deployment of an improved laser guided bomb to Europe.

The Senate recedes.

Single seat attack programs

The request is for $21.9 million in two program elements to develop night vision Flir pods for the A–10 and F–16. An additional $6.9 million was requested in a program entitled Common NATO Munitions which would be allocated to developing a day-only laser designation pod for the F–16.

The House bill approved the funding requests; the Senate amendment provided $2.9 million and recommended that the Flir pod being developed for the F–18 be adopted by the Air Force.

The conferees agreed to provide $2.9 million as recommended by the Senate. This action is without prejudice to ongoing simulator tests on night attack flying being conducted by the Air Force.

The House recedes.

Surface defense suppression (GBU–15)

The House authorized the full $26.0 million request for the GBU–15 air-to-ground weapon development.

The Senate reduced the request by $12.0 million, expressing concern over the limited range and vulnerability of the Planar Wing Weapon and lack of Air Force justification for the full $26.0 million request. The Senate reiterated its view that there is a definite need for a powered standoff weapon to penetrate and destroy hard point targets and air defense systems.

The conferees agreed to authorize $14.0 million for Surface Defense Suppression, emphasizing that priority should be given to the task of continuing development of the Planar Wing Weapon.

The House recedes.

Theater mobile ballistic missile

The House added $25 million authorization to the $105 million requested for the joint service Advanced Ballistic Reentry Systems Program (ABRES) in the Air Force budget request. Of this authorization $20 million was to support the development of the Pershing II reentry vehicle and included the transfer of $10.1 million requested by the Army for that purpose. The remaining $5 million was a transfer of funds requested by the Army for that purpose. The remaining $5 million was a transfer of funds requested by the Army to support the development of the Conventional Airfield Attack Missile (CAAM).

The Senate initiated a program for the Air Force with $2 million authorization, for preliminary design of a long-range, mobile ballistic missile for our theater nuclear forces. The Senate authorized the $10.1 million as requested by the Army for the Pershing II, and the $105 million requested for ABRES. It denied the authorization requested for CAAM.

The conferees agreed to authorize appropriations for the Air Force for $20 million for a theater mobile ballistic missile program to support the Pershing II reentry vehicle development and to initiate a $2 million design effort for a long-range mobile ballistic nuclear missile. The conferees agreed to delete the $5 million requested for CAAM development.

The conferees are strongly concerned that the division of responsibility for surface-to-surface missiles for theater use between the Air Force and Army and the lack of centralized leadership in the Department of Defense have produced weapons programs which are proceeding independently and in some cases without adequate funds. The Pershing II reentry vehicle development, the ground launched cruise missile program, and the new, long-range mobile ballistic missile initiative should all be part of an integrated development and deployment plan to modernize our theater surface-to-surface missile force. Therefore, the conferees recommend that the Secretary of Defense define such a plan and submit it to the Congress not later than the time of the fiscal year 1980 budget submission.

The conferees anticipate that the Secretary of Defense will insure close coordination between the Army Pershing team and the Air Force to facilitate an orderly transition to the fielded Pershing system. In the event the Secretary of Defense decides that it is more effective to return the funding to the Army for the Pershing II development program, the Defense Department integrated development and deployment plan must be submitted to both the Senate and House Armed Services Committees at least thirty days before such transfer.

DEFENSE AGENCIES

Charged particle beam technology

The Navy requested $5.6 million for continued research in the area of charged particle beam technology. The House bill deleted the entire Navy request for authorization and transferred the program to the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) with an increased authorization for appropriation of $6.4 million, resulting in a total fiscal year 1979 authorization of $12.0 million. The Senate amendment authorized the Navy request.

The conferees agreed upon an authorization of $12.0 million to initiate the development of the advanced technology accelerator.

Technical support to the Office of the Secretary of Defense/Office of the Joint Chiefs of Staff

The House bill reduced the Defense Department's $24.184 million request for this program to $11 million. The House specified that of this $11 million, $7 million was authorized for the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering, $2.55 million for the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower, Reserve Affairs and Logistics and the remaining $1.45 million for the Offices of the Assistant Secretary of Defense Program Analysis and Evaluation and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs.

The Senate amendment authorized $13.284 million for this program.

The conferees agreed to authorize $13.284 million. The conferees further agreed that the funds are to be distributed as indicated in the House report with the additional $2.284 million to be used as required by the Secretary of Defense.

Terminally guided submunitions

The House bill deleted the $85.5 million requested by the Department of Defense for the Terminally Guided Submunitions programs, including the Army's Assault Breaker and the Air Force Wide Area Anti-Armor Munitions (WAAM) projects, and instead authorized $68.4 million for these programs in the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) Tactical Technology Program.

The House expressed strong support for these programs but stated that it was essential that strong central management be applied to these programs to assure an early deployment of this new concept in air-to-ground weapons, to reduce costs and to eliminate duplication of effort.

The Senate amendment reduced the $26.1 million request under Advanced Attack Weapons for WAAM concept validation to $5.5 million and authorized the full $21.0 million request for WAAM technology efforts. The Senate viewed the request as excessive in light of the still evolving technologies for these weapons.

The Senate deleted the $10.3 million requested under Common NATO Munitions for Anti-Armor Weaponization Demonstration. The Senate position was that the request was premature in that the project plans were not well defined and technologies concerned were still evolving. The Senate deleted an additional $6.9 million from the Common NATO Munitions line for other tasks not related to anti-armor terminally-guided submunitions.

The conferees shared the concern that the initiation of three parallel efforts in which terminally-guided submunitions were to be developed (Assault Breaker, WAAM, and GSRS Terminally-Guided Warhead) would lead to a duplication of effort. The conferees therefore agreed to delete without prejudice the $8.0 million request under SSM Rocket Systems for the GSRS Terminally-Guided Warhead.

The conferees agreed that DARPA should take the management lead in the Assault Breaker program and agreed to remove all Assault Breaker related authorization from the services' accounts and to add an additional $19.4 million to the DARPA Tactical Technology account for this purpose.

The House conferees reluctantly recede from the House position that WAAM-related work be managed by DARPA and agree to the Senate position that this effort should be funded in the Air Force. The House, therefore, receded to the Senate on WAAM with an amendment that an additional $3 million be authorized for the Advance Attack Weapons program for support of WAAM related work.

The conferees agreed that strong centralized management should be applied to all TGSM related efforts. The conferees, therefore, request that overall management accountability for the entire TGSM effort be vested in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering.

The following table summarizes the conference recommendation relating to Terminally Guided Submunitions work.

ACTIONS ON ASSAULT BREAKER/WAAM/TGSM

[In thousands of dollars]

| | Request | House | Senate | Conference |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Army: | | | | |
| Missile technology | 30,126 | 28,726 | 30,126 | 28,726 |
| Surface-to-surface rocket systems | 70,800 | 62,800 | 70,800 | [1] 62,800 |
| Assault breaker | 10,300 | 0 | 10,300 | [2] 0 |
| Air Force: | | | | |

| DARPA: Tactical technology | 78,600 | 147,000 | 78,600 | 98,000 |

[1] Without prejudice.
[2] All assault breaker work transferred to DARPA for centralized management.

Section 202—Extremely low frequency (ELF)

Section 201 of the House bill authorized $10 million for the Extremely Low Frequency (ELF) communications system. Section 202 of the Senate bill authorize $34.149 million for ELF. In addition, both Houses imposed certain restrictions in the bill on the use of the funds authorized.

The conferees agreed to authorize $20 million for the ELF system and included bill language which combines and modifies the restrictions of both the House and Senate bills.

Section 203—Survivable ICBM

The managers on the part of the House and Senate reiterate their support, as stated in the fiscal year 1977 conference report, for a survivable land-based ICBM system. Such a system may consist of many elements, such as Multiple Aim Point (MAP), rebasing, a more efficient missile, etc., whose design should provide for an enduring, survivable land-based ICBM force capability as required by national policy.

The goals of providing a secure strategic deterrent, and the goals of SALT, to guarantee the security of our strategic forces, are clearly consistent with each other. Details of the proposed SALT II treaty, protocol, and supporting documents should, therefore, provide the necessary safeguards to preserve the U.S. option to deploy a survivable system, regardless of Soviet responses.

The conferees are concerned about the growth in Soviet strategic capability and the attendant vulnerability of the land-based ICBMs. We desire the Department to act on a new program within a time frame consistent with that threat and in a manner which provides program flexibility to respond to changes in the threat with time. Further, we urge the Administration to act, in a timely fashion, on whatever additions or changes, if any, are necessary in SALT II to protect the U.S. option to deploy a new system and to protect U.S. interests should the Soviets deploy a similar system.

Section 201 of the Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1978, (P.L. 95–79) included for the Air Force authorization for $15.7 million. The legislation prohibits either obligation or expenditure of any amount of the $15.7 million "until at least one member country of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (other than the United States) enters into a contract to purchase the AWACS aircraft."

The law was enacted to prohibit the United States from financing, with fiscal year 1978 appropriations, development of the NATO AWACS system before a NATO ally agreed to contribute to the purchase of AWACS aircraft.

The United States has expended development funds during fiscal year 1978 for a cooperative NATO AWACS development program. These funds were available for obligation from appropriations for fiscal year 1977. Other NATO countries also contributed to the fiscal year 1978 development program.

Presently, NATO nations are considering commitment to the acquisition of the AWACS system as a multi-lateral procurement through a multi-national organization. The Department of Defenese anticipates a program acquisition decision during the fall of 1978. In order to continue an orderly cooperative development program during the interim before a procurement decision, the Secretary of Defense has requested legislative modification of the fiscal year 1978 authorization in order to permit the United States to obligate and expend $4,066 million as its share of the on-going program.

The Senate amendment considered by the conferees contained a provision which deleted all legislative restrictions on the obligation or expenditure of the $15.7 million authorized for fiscal year 1978. The House conferees accepted the Senate proposal, as requested by the Secretary of Defense, to delete the restriction.

The conferees agreed that the removal of the restriction is done with the intent that the Secretary of Defense has immediately available for obligation $4.066 million. If additional funding is required before a NATO ally has agreed to contribute to AWACS procurement, the Secretary of Defense must notify both the Senate and House Armed Services Committees.

The conferees further agreed that for fiscal year 1979, $10 million would be authorized for the NATO AWACS development program. This authorization is restricted by the same language included in the fiscal year 1978 authorization.

The House recedes.

Cooperative Tank Gun

The House bill contained a provision (Sec. 201) which stated that of the RDT&E authorization for the Army, $8.1 million available for cooperative tank gun development shall not be obligated unless the Committee on Armed Services acts favorably on the proposed reprogramming action for fiscal year 1978 for the program. The House committee subsequently did approve the reprogramming and, therefore, the House recedes.

Cruise Missile Carrier

Of the funds authorized to be appropriated under Section 201 for the Air Force, $20,600,000 shall be available only for study and exploratory development, including hardware development, including a cost and operational effectiveness analysis to determine the most cost effective system, and including a cost and operational hardware analysis of the aircraft platforms for use as a cruise missile carrier. Such study shall include consideration of use of both military and civilian aircraft, including the B–1, AMST, C–141 and C–5A in addition to the B–52. None of the funds authorized to be appropriated for this purpose shall be available for engineering development leading to production of aircraft other than the B–52 for use as a cruise missile carrier. The President shall report to the Congress on the results of such study and exploratory development, together with his decision and recommendations on the aircraft and systems to be used as a cruise missile carrier when a request is made for such system.

Section 204 of the Senate amendment included a provision restricting use of funds for development of a cruise missile carrier aircraft pending receipt of an arms control impact statement. The House conferees strenuously objected to this language.

The Senate recedes.

TITLE III—ACTIVE FORCES

Active duty military strengths in the House bill and Senate amendment differed by a total of 5,850. The conferees agreed to authorize the following end strengths.

| | House bill | Senate bill | Conference report |
|---|---|---|---|
| Army | 776,600 | 775,800 | 775,800 |
| Navy | 525,300 | 521,700 | 523,550 |
| Marine Corps | 191,500 | 190,000 | 190,000 |
| Air Force | 566,350 | 566,400 | 566,400 |
| Total | 2,059,750 | 2,053,900 | 2,055,750 |

The authorized end strength for the Army exceeds the Administration request by 4,100. This increment includes an increase of 2,100 for the Army training establishment, and 2,000 spaces for recruiters for the Army National Guard and the Army Reserve.

The Department of Defense manpower program for fiscal year 1979 proposed a total of 4,100 positions as outlined in the Senate report, in the Army National Guard and Army Reserve primarily for recruiters for these components. These recruiters were to be on active duty tours as reservists on "active duty for training." The conferees agree it is inappropriate to characterize these reservists as on active duty for training when their function is operational in substance.

By including half of these people in this year's authorization, the conferees have provided for a transition from this status of "active duty for training" to a new status of active duty for organizing, administering, recruiting, instructing or training the reserves. The conferees agree that a legislative proposal will be considered at the earliest possible date to create authority for this new category.

Reserve recruiters shall continue to be paid from reserve appropriations and remain under the operational control of the reserves.

The end strength authorized for the Navy in fiscal year 1979 is 523,550. The increase of 1,850 over the Administration request is for an increase in the amount of formal training planned for new enlistees in fiscal year 1979. The conferees expect the Navy to maintain current standards of quality for accessions in their recruiting program in fiscal year 1979. The conferees are convinced that the Navy can increase the contribution of Naval Reservists in manning the shore establishment and expect to see plans to use the Naval Reserve in base support and other areas in which the active Navy is undermanned.

The House recedes to the Senate on the end strength authorized for the Marine Corps in fiscal year 1979.

For the Air Force, the conferees agreed to authorize an end strength of 566,400. This figure, which is 800 over the Administration request, provides for a transition of reserve recruiters into the new category mentioned above, and for an adjustment made necessary by a decision, made after the budget was submitted, not to accomplish the modernization of certain intelligence activities.

The conferees are concerned about the current and future status of the All Volunteer Force and endorse the language in the Senate report which suggests that the Department of Defense examine the possibility of alternatives to the All Volunteer Force.

The conferees are also aware that in its current status, the Selective Service System probably cannot meet established Department of Defense requirements for manpower in a mobilization. The Selective Service System must be managed and funded in a manner to meet national security requirements.

As one alternative to be examined, the Secretary of Defense is requested to conduct a test of a two year enlistment option for the combat arms skills in the Army, and the seagoing engineering ratings in the Navy, to determine whether this option will attract higher quality personnel. This option is to be coupled with an enhanced post service educational program under the Secretary of Defense's existing authority to increase the government's contribution under the Post-Vietnam Era Veterans' Educational Assistance Program (GI Bill Improvements Act of 1977).

The results of the test should be made available to the Committees on Armed Services and Appropriations of the Senate and House as soon as possible. An evaluation of the test should accompany the report to Congress. The report should address the cost impact of the two-year enlistment option in terms of attrition, marital status, and increased turnover due to this shorter term and other factors which may result from the kind of personnel attracted to the force by this option.

TITLE IV—RESERVE FORCES

Title IV, section 401, of the bill contains the authorization for the strength of the Selected Reserve of each reserve component of the Armed Forces for fiscal year 1979.

The House and Senate positions differed on the strengths of the Army National Guard, Army Reserve, Air National Guard, and Air Force Reserve. The difference resulted from the Senate's decision to include full-time reservists on recruiting and management duties in active duty strengths.

The strength agreed to permits the reserve recruiters not transitioned into the new category during fiscal year 1979 to continue to be accounted for under reserve strengths until the transition is completed into a single category.

RESERVE RECRUITING INCENTIVES

Section 402, 403 and 404 of the House bill established the educational assistance program, the enlistment bonus and the reenlistment bonus as permanent authority. The Senate amendment extended the authority for an educational assistance program and a reenlistment bonus for one year.

The conferees agreed to authorize all three of the incentives for a period of two years.

The Senate recedes to the House language for each of these three incentives except that, for the reenlistment bonus, the Secretary's authority to determine to whom the bonus is offered is clarified.

The conferees agree that the enlistment bonus and the educational assistance program shall be implemented on a test basis. The enlistment bonus should be tested with the dollar amount of the bonus offered at varying levels. In the cases of the reenlistment bonus, if the test underway is successful, this bonus may be used in a broader program for units identified for early deployment or early support missions in time of mobilization.

On section 405 of the House bill, which established a specific dollar figure for these incentives in law, the House recedes.

The conferees agree that these authorizations may be used in a program of up to $25 million in fiscal year 1979 and that the Department may and is expected to reprogram additional funds for use in this manner if reserve strengths continue to decline. The conferees do not intend for these incentives to be regarded as entitlements, but as necessary pilot expedients to meet an existing problem.

Restriction on Transfer From the Ready Reserve to the Standby Reserve

Section 406 of the House bill eliminates the option for an individual in the Ready Reserve to transfer to the Standby Reserve for the last year of obligated service.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

TITLE V—CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

For fiscal year 1979, the Department of Defense requested an end strength of 1,007,500.

The House authorized a Department-wide end strength of 1,018,200.

The Senate authorized a civilian end strength for each of the Services totaling 999,100.

The conferees agreed to provide for an overall Department of Defense-wide authorization for civilian personnel of 1,005,500—a reduction of 2,000 from the Administration's request.

The conferees agree that this reduction should be made in white collar civilians in the Washington area, primarily in command/headquarters. This reduction should be accomplished by attrition and without a reduction-in-force. The conferees agree on an increase of 1,100 civilians for the Naval Air Rework facilities and an increase of 400 in aircraft maintenance for the Air Force.

The conferees are also concerned about the justifications for increases in foreign military sales personnel and in the level of Army white collar civilians as expressed in the Senate report.

The conferees agreed that particularly in activities engaged in maintenance, construction or repair, the Department of Defense must manage manpower resources in a manner that will insure these activities are provided sufficient civilian manpower to fulfill work requirements for which funds have been appropriated. The recommended reductions are not directed at these activities, many of which are industrially funded.

The conferees request the Secretary of Defense to report to the Committees on Armed Services of each house within 60 days an initial allocation of the authorized strength, and with a subsequent report by January 31, 1979 on a final allocation of this strength for fiscal year 1979. The report should address the allocation of the authorized strengths among the military departments and Defense Agencies, as well as the Defense planning and programming categories therein.

Authority for Secretary of Defense To Exceed the Authorized Strength

The conferees agreed to provide authority for the Secretary of Defense to exceed the authorized strength by 1¼ percent when he determines it is in the national interest to do so. The Secretary shall promptly notify the Congress of any decision to effect such an increase.

TITLE VI—MILITARY TRAINING STUDENT LOANS

Sec. 601. Army One Station Unit Training combines Recruit Training and Initial Skill

Training in certain skills into a single, continuous course conducted by a single training unit at one location. The conferees fully support the concept of One Station Unit Training, including the full implementation of Infantry One Station Unit Training at Fort Benning in fiscal year 1979. The increase of 324 for the authorized One Station Unit Training load in the Army is to permit this program to continue at Fort Bliss. The conferees also agree on an increase of 100 for Physician Assistant Training in the Army.

The House recedes with an amendment.

The Senate had not provided authority for the Secretary to adjust the authorized military training student loads for the Army or Air Force. The conferees do not intend that this authority be used for a decrease in One Station Unit Training loads. The Senate therefore recedes.

Reduction or Realignment of the Training Base

Section 602 of the House bill requires the Secretary of Defense to notify the Committees on Armed Services and Appropriations of the Senate and House of the specific details of any substantial reduction or realignment of the training base structure planned as a part of the fiscal year 1979 Defense program, and certify that the plan is in the best interest of national security and provides for efficient management. No action implementing the plan submitted can be taken until thirty legislative days have passed.

The Senate recedes.

TITLE VII—CIVIL DEFENSE

The Administration budget request for programs of the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency was $96.5 million. The House bill provided $137 million for civil defense and the Senate bill authorized $96.5 million.

The conferees agreed to the Senate level of $96.5 million.

The House recedes.

Both versions provided for the study of the civil defense needs of counterforce areas in the United States. The Senate bill included those areas where significant defense-related research laboratories or facilities are located. The conferees agreed to this modification.

In the event that either House does not reject the Administration's emergency preparedness reorganization plan currently before the Congress, the conferees agreed to the Senate technical amendment that would allow transfer of authorization of the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency programs to a successor agency.

TITLE VIII—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Extension of Authority for Special Pay for Health Professionals

Section 801 of the House bill contained a provision that extends, for two years, authority to provide special pay and bonuses for military health professionals. These programs include special pay for physicians, dentists, optometrists, and veterinarians; Variable Incentive Pay for physicians below flag rank; and Special Continuation Pay for physicians above pay grades O–6 (Colonel/Navy Captain) and dentists. Authority for these programs presently expires on September 30, 1978.

The Senate amendment contained no such provision.

The Senate recedes.

Extension of Reenlistment and Enlistment Bonuses

Section 802 of the House bill contained a provision that extends, for two years, authority to provide reenlistment and enlistment bonuses to enlisted personnel in critical skills. These programs provide up to $15,000 as a reenlistment bonus and up to $3,000 as an enlistment bonus. Authority for these programs presently expires on September 30, 1978.

Section 802 also would guarantee that the bonus in effect for a skill at the time a member agrees to retrain in that skill would be the bonus payable to him once he qualifies and reenlists in the new skill. Under present law, a member may only be paid a bonus when the skill in which he reenlists is designated for a bonus at the time of reenlistment. The Secretary of each military department should insure that the time between an agreement to retrain and actual reenlistment is held to a minimum.

The Senate amendment contained no such provision.

The Senate recedes.

Extension of Platoon Leaders Class Subsistence Payment

Section 803 of the House bill contained a provision that extends, for two years, the authority to provide financial assistance to officer candidates under the Marine Corps Platoon Leaders Class program. The program expires on September 30, 1978. This program provides a subsistence payment of $100 for each of the 9 months of the college year after an officer candidate has successfully completed summer training. This is similar to the subsistence allowance paid to ROTC candidates while in the senior ROTC program.

The Senate amendment contained no such provision.

The Senate recedes.

Special Pay for Sea Duty

Section 902 of the Senate amendment modifies the structure and rates of sea pay for enlisted personnel assigned to sea duty along the lines of a DOD legislative proposal.

Current rates vary from $8 per month to $22.50 per month based on pay grade and are paid whenever the member is on sea duty.

The rates authorized by the Senate vary from $25 per month to $100 per month and are based on the member's total amount of sea duty. Payment would be restricted to enlisted members who have achieved petty officer grade (E4 and above) and who have completed 3 years of cumulative sea duty.

The provision includes a one-year save pay provision that would insure that anyone on sea duty on September 30, 1978, would continue to receive at least the current rates for that year.

The House bill contained no such provision.

The House conferees proposed an amendment to the Senate provision that would continue the application of the present system to all enlisted members on active duty on September 30, 1978, who would lose eligibility under the new sea pay provision. In addition, this save pay protection would be effective for three years. Instead of moving immediately to the new higher rates, the House amendment would move gradually, over three years, to the new rates.

The House recedes with an amendment.

Reorganization of the Army Dental Corps

Until recently a dental activity at an Army unit would be under the control of the unit's medical activity. Organizationally, the commander of the medical activity reported to the post commander; and the hospital and the dental activity were organizationally under the medical activity. The commander of the medical activity and the commander of the hospital was the same individual. Resource allocations such as manpower, funds and equipment were made by the physician in his capacity as the head of the medical activity.

Section 804 of the House bill contained a provision that places in statute the revised organizational structure in which the commander of the medical activity and the commander of the dental activity both report to the post commander. The hospital would continue to be under the command of the commander of the medical activity. The Army has already implemented—administratively—many of the provisions of section 804.

Section 804 also contained a provision that establishes the statutory position of Assistant Surgeon General for Dental Services in the Air Force.

The Senate amendment contained no such provision although a similar bill is now pending in the Senate.

The Senate recedes.

Commandant of the Marine Corps on the Joint Chiefs of Staff

Section 913 of the Senate amendment altered section 141 of title 10, United States Code, to make the Commandant of the Marine Corps a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The House bill contained no such provision.

The House recedes.

Women on Ships

Section 302 of the House bill and section 901 of the Senate amendment contained language which removes restrictions in law to permit Navy women to be assigned to noncombat vessels on a permanent basis, and to temporary duty aboard combat vessels not expected to be assigned combat missions.

The House bill included additional language which (1) clarified that women on temporary duty with a combat ship will fill billets in addition to the ship's required complement and only for a period of not more than six months; (2) stated that every reasonable effort would be made to disembark women on a ship assigned a combat mission; (3) defined the term combat mission as one which has as one of its primary objectives "to seek out, reconnoiter, or engage the enemy"; and (4) empowered the Secretary of the Navy to promulgate regulations for the assignment of women to ships.

The House recedes.

Female Undergraduates at Military Colleges

The Senate bill contained a provision (section 602) that requires that military colleges must make military training available to qualified undergraduate female students under regulations established by the Secretary of Defense, but the Secretary shall not require that military training for female students be compulsory.

The House recedes with a technical amendment to the language.

U.S. Navy Shipbuilding Policy

Section 801 of the Senate amendment contained a provision stating in part that it is the policy of the U.S. government to build smaller and less costly aircraft carriers, unless the President advised the Congress that construction of such ships was not in the national interest.

The House bill contained no such provision.

The conferees agreed that in the request for authorization for additional ships for the combatant forces, including aircraft carriers, the President should include a recommendation as to whether or not the ship should be nuclear powered, and the reasons therefore.

The House recedes with an amendment.

Carrier Service Life Extension Program (SLEP) and DDG–2 Destroyer Conversion

Section 810 of the House bill contained a provision that would preclude the assignment of any of the carrier SLEP or DDG–2 conversion ships to a specific public or private shipyard until a comprehensive study is completed by the Secretary of the Navy and presented to the Congress as to the least cost alternative to the government of accomplishing the work.

Section 908 of the Senate amendment contained an almost identical provision.

The House and Senate amendments did not differ in substance or intent. The conferees agreed upon clarifying language blending both provisions.

The House recedes with an amendment.

Sea-Based Aircraft Platform Study Funds

Section 809 of the House bill provided that leftover funds authorized to be appropriated in Public Law 95-78 for comprehensive evaluation studies of sea-based aircraft platforms be applied toward continuing study of any aircraft carrier platform authorized by the FY 1979 Defense Authorization Act.

The Senate amendment contained no such provision.

The Senate recedes.

Certification of Claims

Section 808 of the House bill contained a provision requiring that a senior company official certify that a claim and supporting data against the U.S. Government, is accurate, complete and current.

The Senate amendment contained no such provision.

The conferees agreed to modifying language so that certification of claims could be more reasonably administered by senior company officials. The retroactive feature of the House bill has been eliminated.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

Restriction on Contracting Out Commercial and Industrial Type Functions

Section 805 of the House bill contained a provision requiring the Secretary of Defense to use, during fiscal year 1979, the policy and regulations which were in force before June 30, 1976, when determining whether commercial or industrial functions should be performed by defense employees or private contractors. This requirement would lapse before the end of fiscal year 1979 if the Secretary of Defense submits a report detailing proposed changes in policy and regulations to the Congress ninety days before implementation of the changes.

The Senate amendment had no similar provision.

The conferees agree to amend the language of the section by reducing the time from ninety days to sixty days that the Secretary of Defense must wait before implementing changes in policy and regulations after submitting a report to Congress.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

Prohibition on Sale of Certain Defense Articles from Stocks of the Department of Defense

Section 911 of the Senate amendment prohibited the sale of certain defense articles from stocks of the Department of Defense unless the President determined that there was an international crisis affecting the national security of the United States and that the sale of such stocks was in the national interest. The House bill contained no such provision.

The House recedes with certain technical amendments.

1980 Olympic Winter Games

Section 806 of the House bill provided logistical support and personnel services, including medical services, transportation, communications, course preparation and security to the 1980 Olympic winter games. Also, the Secretary of Defense could lend and provide equipment and such other services as may be considered necessary and appropriate.

The Senate amendment contained no similar provision.

The Senate conferees were concerned with the suggested use of military personnel for certain non-military purposes and offered an amendment to which the House conferees concurred, which would authorize the Secretary of Defense to provide logistical support and personnel services, to lend and provide equipment and provide such other services as may be considered necessary and appropriate. In addition, cost of such assistance would be limited to $2 million, in fiscal year 1979, with an additional requirement that the funds be appropriated.

The use of Armed Forces personnel and equipment should only be for specialized services that are uniquely within the competence of the Department of Defense. It is not intended that Armed Forces personnel will be used for the construction of facilities or as a replacement for services available from civilian sources.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

Panama Canal

Section 813 of the House bill provided that none of the funds authorized to be appropriated shall be used for the purpose of effecting any force reduction or base realignment in the Panama Canal Zone in support of implementation of the Panama Canal Treaties without a specific Act of Congress. There was no similar provision in the Senate amendment.

The Senate conferees offered an amendment which would restrict expenditure of funds authorized to be appropriated in this Act for the realignment of any military installation in the Canal Zone to such use as is consistent with the responsibility of and the necessity for the United States to defend the Panama Canal or with legislation which may be enacted to implement the Panama Canal Treaties of 1978. The House conferees concurred.

The Senate recedes with an amendment.

Technical Amendment Authorizing the Number of Navy Admirals and Marine Corps Generals

Section 903 of the Senate amendment contained a provision that authorizes the distribution of flag officers by grade for the Navy and Marine Corps consistent with those of the Army and Air Force. The provision substitutes the term "active duty" for the term "active list" as it applies to flag officers in pay grades O-9 and O-10.

The House bill contained no such provision.

The House recedes.

Commissary Baggers

Section 909 of the Senate amendment provided that individuals who perform bagger or carryout service in a commissary shall not be considered employed for the purpose of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 if sole compensation is derived from the commissary patron as a result of tips.

The House recedes.

NATO Defense Expenditures

The Senate amendment contained a provision (Sec. 910) that would require the President to submit to Congress a report, not later than February 1, 1979, on the defense expenditures of each NATO member nation for fiscal year 1978 and the planned defense expenditurs for fiscal year 1979.

The House bill contained no such provision.

The House conferees agreed that such a report should be submitted to Congress but argued strongly that the requirement for the report should be contained in the Statement of Managers and not the law.

Accordingly, the conferees request the Secretary of Defense to submit to the Congress not later than February 1, 1979, a written report showing the actual NATO defense expenditure of each member nation, including the United States, during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978, and the planned NATO defense expenditure of each such member nation for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979. The Secretary of Defense shall indicate in the case of each such member nation whether the planned expenditure for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, represents an increase or decrease from the previous fiscal year, after adjustment for inflation, and the percent of such increase or decrease, after adjustment for inflation.

Restriction on Procurement of Articles Containing Foreign-Produced Specialty Metals

Section 807 of the House bill contained a provision that would prohibit, with certain minor exceptions, the use of funds authorized to be appropriated under section 138 of title 10, United States Code, for the procurement of any article containing specialty metals (including stainless steel flatware) not produced in the United States or its possessions.

The Senate amendment contained no such provision. The conferees agreed that the President of the United States should determine whether or not the importation of steel from foreign countries for arms manufacture is excessive, depressive or beneficial to American national interest; and if he finds that the importation is excessive, he should take active steps to negotiate a fairer proportion of American steel for production of arms in the United States.

The House recedes.

Nuclear Powered Navy

Section 907 of the Senate amendment contained a provision to repeal Title VIII of the Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1975 (88 Stat. 408) which required that submarines and major combatant ships of the Navy be nuclear powered.

The House bill contained no such provision.

The conferees agreed that the provision was no longer necessary since such objectives can be achieved through the legislative process.

The House recedes.

Shipbuilding Commission

Section 906 of the Senate amendment contained a provision requiring a comprehensive study of current policies and procedures for procuring ships by a special commission to be appointed by the President.

The House bill contained no such provision.

The conferees note that the Navy is devoting increased attention to the solution of existing shipbuilding problems. However, a recently completed Navy study points to the need for continued diligent effort toward final solution of management and policy problems facing the Navy and the entire maritime industry.

The conferees are mindful of the unqualified support of the shipbuilding industry of the need for a comprehensive study by a special Presidential commission. In that such a commission does not require establishment by special statute, the Senate recedes. However, the conferees urge that the President give consideration to establishment of such a commission to assist in identification and resolution of shipbuilding and maritime problems.

The Senate recedes.

Manpower Productivity Study

Section 812 of the House bill required the Secretary of Defense to provide a report to the Congress by the end of fiscal year 1979 on efforts to formulate a productivity plan for manpower needs and to gather productivity data upon which to base manpower requests for subsequent years.

The Senate report contains language requesting an analysis of manpower productivity in next year's Military Manpower Requirements Report. The conferees endorse this request.

The House recedes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 12138. An act to name a certain Federal building in Laguna Niguel, Calif., the "Chet Hatfield Building."

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 920. An act relating to the disposition of certain recreational demonstration project lands by the State of Oklahoma;

S. 2463. An act to amend the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 (Public Law 95-87) to raise certain authorized funding levels contained therein, and for other purposes; and

S.J. Res. 102. Joint resolution, American Indian religious freedom.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee did on July 28, 1978, present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 11832. To authorize appropriations under the Arms Control and Disarmament Act for the fiscal year 1979, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 12426. To authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide financial assistance for the city of New York.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 57 minutes p.m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, August 1, 1978, at 10 o'clock a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

4666. A letter from the Deputy Secretary of Defense, transmitting reports of nine violations of the Anti-Deficiency Act, pursuant to section 3679(i)(2) of the Revised Statutes, as amended; to the Committee on Appropriations.

4667. A letter from the General Counsel of the Department of Defense, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code, to prescribe the power of the President to promulgate rules for the administration of military justice within the armed forces; to the Committee on Armed Services.

4668. A letter from the Director of Legislation, Department of the Navy, transmitting notice of the Navy's intention to transfer an auxiliary ocean tug to the Government of Haiti, pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 7307; to the Committee on Armed Service.

4669. A letter from the Director of Legislation, Department of the Navy, transmitting notice of the Navy's intention to transfer four landing craft to the Government of Indonesia, pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 7307; to the Committee on Armed Services.

4670. A letter from the Executive Secretary to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, transmitting proposed interim final regulations regarding federally insured loans to graduate students in selected health care fields, pursuant to section 431(d)(1) of the General Education Provisions Act, as amended; to the Committe on Education and Labor.

4671. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting notice of a proposed new records system by the Community Relations Service of the Department of Justice, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 552a(o); to the Committee on Government Operations.

4672. A letter from the vice president for Government affairs, National Railroad Passenger Corporation; transmitting the financial report of the Corporation for the month of April 1978, pursuant to section 308(a)(1) of the Rail Passenger Service Act of 1970, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

UNITED STATES CITIZENS IMPRISONED IN TURKEY

SEC. 22. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) although informal discussions have been held, no final agreement has been reached on a prisoner exchange treaty between the United States and Turkey;

(2) the Congress has already enacted the legislation necessary to implement prisoner exchange treaties (Public law 95-144); and

(3) Turkey has already ratified a prisoner exchange treaty involving European countries and therefore should be willing to enter into such a treaty with the United States.

(b) The Congress urges the President to press forward vigorously with efforts to rapidly conclude negotiation of a prisoner exchange treaty with Turkey.

(c) The President shall report to the Congress within 60 days after the date of enactment of this Act, and at least once every 30 days thereafter, on the status of the negotiations with Turkey on a prisoner exchange treaty and on progress toward full respect for the fundamental human and legal rights of all United States citizens detained in Turkey.

H.R. 12514

By Mr. SEIBERLING:

—Strike Subsection 16(a) and substitute the following:

"(a) Section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by striking out all after the (x) in the first line of the Subsection and substitute the following:

(1) The Congress expects that measurable progress toward a settlement of the Cyprus dispute will occur in the immediate future, including the following:

(i) Removal of all Turkish armed forces from the municipality of Famagusta and their replacement by United Nations Security Forces;

(ii) Freedom for all former residents of Famagusta to return to their homes and properties in that city;

(iii) Resumption of intercommunal negotiations for settlement of the Cyprus problem based upon United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3212.

(2) In the case of any letter or offer to sell any defense article or defense service, any proposed sale, credit or guaranty or any proposed security assistance to Turkey if such articles or services have an aggregate value of $25 million or more or if any major defense equipment has a value of $7 million or more, the President shall submit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate a statement containing (A) a brief description of the defense article or service involved, (B) the dollar value thereof, (C) the branch of the United States Armed Forces involved, and (D) the day on which the offer to sell is to be issued or the proposed sale, credit, guaranty or transfer is to take place. Such letter of offer, credit or guaranty shall not be issued or such transfer shall not be made if either the House or Senate, within 30 legislative days after receiving any such statement, adopts a resolution stating in effect that it objects to such proposed sale, credit, guaranty or transfer: Provided, That the President may exempt a specific offer to sell, credit, guaranty or transfer from the provisions of this sentence if he declares in such statement that there is an emergency affecting the security interests of the United States which is of sufficient urgency as to require immediate action on the proposed sale, credit, guaranty or transfer.

H.R. 12514

By Mr. STRATTON:

—On page 15, strike out all of line 12 and all that follows down through line 20 and insert the following:

SEC. 19. (a)(1) The President is authorized, until September 30, 1979—

(A) to transfer, without reimbursement, to the Republic of Korea, in conjunction with the withdrawal of not more than 6,000 troops of the 2nd Infantry Division and associated Army support forces from Korea, such United States Government-owned defense articles as he may determine which are located in Korea in the custody of those United States Army units scheduled to depart from Korea; and

On page 17, line 14 strike out "$800,000,000" and insert "$90,000,000".

On page 17, line 15, strike out all after the comma and down through "1983" on line 18

On page 18, at the end of line 4, add the following new sentence: "Such report to the Congress shall also include assessments of the effect of any proposed withdrawal of further troops from Korea on preserving deterrence in Korea; the reaction anticipated from North Korea; a consideration of the effect of the proposed additional withdrawal on increasing incentives for South Korea to develop an independent nuclear deterrent; the effect of any further troop withdrawals on our long-term military and economic partnership with Japan; the effect of any proposed further withdrawals on the United States-Chinese and the United States-Soviet military balance; and the possible implications of any proposed further withdrawal on the Soviet-Chinese military situation."

H.R. 12514

By Mr. WOLFF:

—Page 19, immediately after line 20, add the following new section:

UNITED STATES RELATIONS WITH THE SOVIET UNION

SEC. 22.(a) The Congress finds and declares that a sound and stable relationship with the Soviet Union will help achieve the objectives of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act, strengthen the security of the United States, and improve the prospects for world peace.

(b) Therefore, it is the sense of the Congress that the President, in cooperation with the Congress and knowledgeable members of the public, shall make a full review of United States policy towards the Soviet Union. This review should cover, but not be limited to—

(1) an overall reevaluation of the objectives and priorities of the United States in its relations with the Soviet Union;

(2) the evolution of and sources of all bargaining power of the United States with respect to the Soviet Union and how that bargaining power might be enhanced;

(3) what linkages do exist and what linkages should or should not exist between various elements of United States-Soviet relations such as arms control negotiations, human rights issues, and economic and cultural exchanges;

(4) the policies of the United States toward human rights conditions in the Soviet Union and how improved Soviet respect for human rights might be more effectively achieved;

(5) the current status of strategic arms limitations talks and whether such talks should be continued in their present framework or terminated and renewed in some other forum;

(6) the current status of other arms control negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union;

(7) the challenges posed by Soviet and Cuban involvement in developing countries and a study of appropriate policy responses and instruments to meet those challenges more effectively;

(8) the impact of our relations with the People's Republic of China on our relations with the Soviet Union;

(9) the impact of strategic parity on relations between the United States and the Soviet Union and on the ability of the United States to meet its obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty;

(10) United States economic, technological, scientific, and cultural relations with the Soviet Union and whether those relations are desirable and should be continued, expanded, restricted, or linked to other aspects of relations between the United States and the Soviet Union;

(11) the evolution of Soviet domestic politics and the relationship between Soviet domestic politics and its foreign policy behavior, especially towards the United States; and

(12) what improvements should be made in the institutions and procedures of United States foreign policy in order to ensure a coherent and effective policy towards the Soviet Union.

(c) The President shall report the results of the review called for by subsection (b) to the Congress not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

—Page 19, immediately after line 20, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 22. It is the sense of the Congress that the United States should be responsive to the defense requirements of Israel, and sell Israel additional advanced aircraft in order to maintain Israel's defense capability, which is essential to peace."

H.R. 12931

By Mr. DERWINSKI:

—On page 6, line 23, strike "$1,827,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,737,000,000".

On page 7, in line 1, immediately after "Egypt," insert "and";

On page 7, in line 2, immediately after "Jordan" strike all that follows through the end of that line and insert in lieu thereof a colon;

On page 7, in line 13, strike the period at the end of the line and insert in lieu thereof a colon;

On page 7, immediately after line 13 insert the following new proviso: "Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated under this heading may be used to provide assistance to Syria."

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

WANT TO RUN THE POST OFFICE?

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, one of the most educational columns in recent years on the Postal Service was one by the veteran columnist Roscoe Drummond, writing in the Christian Science Monitor of July 26. May I add that not only members of the press but also Members of Congress very often do not understand nor appreciate the complex situation effecting the Postal Service. The article follows:

WANT TO RUN THE POST OFFICE?

(By Roscoe Drummond)

WASHINGTON.—The U.S. Postal Service has millions of disgruntled customers. You are probably one of them—and with good reason. Your mail usually arrives late. It is often misdirected and travels back and forth across the country. The price of stamps rises faster than inflation. In many cities companies have to hire messengers to deliver their letters in a radius of 10 to 20 miles in order to transact the day's business; don't depend on the mailman.

No improvement is in sight.

It's a mess all right, and while columnists affect to have good answers for almost everything—which we usually don't have—I am at a loss for any clear solution.

But I can see what has been going wrong. Seven years ago Congress shed itself of all responsibility for running the Post Office because it was running it into the ground and couldn't wait to assure the voters that the politicians weren't to blame any more.

They just bundled it up in one big package called the Postal Reorganization Act and told the new Postal Service to run itself, to borrow billions of dollars to modernize, to bargain with labor, and to price its services so that it could soon pay its own way.

The mandate didn't work—and probably couldn't be made to work the way it was set up.

The new electronic, fast-moving, automatic equipment helped; some worked badly, some worked well and in a few years 63 percent of the letter mail went through sorting machines compared with 5 percent in earlier years.

But what about greatly needed savings if the Postal Service was ever to get in the black? Reduced personnel, yes; the number of workers down from 729,000 to 655,000 and this during an increase of mail volume from 87 billion to 92 billion pieces a year.

But hear this: labor cost under the old Post Office amounted to 83 percent of total operating expenses. And after all the modernization, the labor share of total operations rose to 84 percent.

The reason: the collective bargaining provision of the so-called postal reform act caused postal wages (once too low) to climb from $10,000 a year to $18,000 a year (a level far out of line). Mostly as a result of these high labor costs, it took $9 billion to operate the mails in 1971 and $15.3 billion last year. No wonder we have been witnessing the most rapid rise in postal rates in history—and there is no end in sight.

One thing needs to be understood. Individual letter writers no longer provide much of the postal business. They constitute a small part of the mail. At least 80 percent of first-class mail comes from or goes to businesses. Thus it is the senders of mail which do most to support the Postal Service and, if the Postal Service is ever to get into the black, the income will have to come overwhelmingly from business firms. Already for some of them postage is one of the largest costs of operation.

In many ways businesses pay the freight for most of the Postal Service costs and the household recipients do most to put the service in the red. This is why the postal authorities want to cut back deliveries to private residences to thrice weekly and business deliveries to five days a week.

Congress shrinks from this measure. There are too many recipients who vote. Perhaps Congress should face the prospect of subsidizing public service mail and let business mail pay only its fair share.

I suspect you don't want to run the Postal Service.●

NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES SUPPORTS AIRPORT AND AIRCRAFT NOISE REDUCTION ACT AND URGES PROMPT AND POSITIVE ACTION

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, we have been furnished a copy of a letter from Mayor Tom Moody of Columbus, Ohio, president of the National League of Cities, and Alan Beals, executive director written to the Honorable James J. Delaney chairman of the Committee on Rules. The letter forthrightly supports H.R. 8729, the Airport and Aircraft Noise Reduction Act and its companion Ways and Means bill, H.R. 11986, which is proposed as title III of the former.

The National League of Cities represents a constituency located in every congressional district in the country. Their support of titles I, II, and III cannot be taken lightly. It represents an affirmation not only of the seriousness of the problem but of well-considered action to solve the problem.

NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES,
Washington, D.C., July 19, 1978.

Hon. JAMES J. DELANEY,
Chairman, Committee on Rules,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The National League of Cities urges the Rules Committee to report out the Airport and Aircraft Noise Financing Bill (H.R. 8729) and its Ways and Means Committee companion, the Noisy Aircraft Revenue Act (H.R. 11986) as soon as possible. The National League of Cities has supported and helped develop this bill to abate noise around the Nation's major airports. Some 7 million people who live in urbanized areas are affected by high levels of airport and aircraft noise pollution. There is growing and convincing evidence that this noise is detrimental to emotional and physical health.

This legislation represents the best chance to enact meaningful aircraft noise reduction legislation during this session of Congress. Title I of H.R. 8729 provides for $15 million in noise mapping and planning grants for FY 79 and FY 80 with an additional $400 million of noise implementation grants for FY 79 and 80. These grants noise impacted land around busy airports. will help airport operators purchase severely Title II contains additional authority for construction and safety grants for airports. Title III seeks to reduce noise at its source which is the aircraft engine. NLC's policy has long supported abatement of pollution at the source.

We urge your Committee to take prompt and positive action on reporting these two bills to the Floor. Our membership across the country supports them fully and it is hopeful that Congress will take this first step toward combating aircraft noise pollution.

Sincerely,

TOM MOODY,
President.
ALAN BEALS,
Executive Director.●

THE TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO DEBATE, NO. 3

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, in their third letter to Members of the House of Representatives, the proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey argue that lifting the embargo would be extremely dangerous to vital American security interests abroad and that keeping the embargo is the only way to bring about the full participation of both Greece and Turkey in NATO.

I attach for the attention of my colleagues the third letter from the proponents of the embargo and my rebuttal. I argue in a rebuttal that the predominant view of defense experts and our defense leaders is that it is essential to lift the embargo and that the question is not whether Turkey stays in NATO but at what strength. In addition, it is noteworthy that we need both Greece and Turkey in NATO but lifting the embargo is more likely to bring Greece back in full NATO participation on the terms Greece seeks.

This exchange of letters follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July, 1978.

THE EMBARGO AND NATIONAL SECURITY

DEAR COLLEAGUE: In its attempt to lift the Turkish arms embargo, the Carter Administration has avoided discussing the requirements of American law and has focused instead on what it claims are overriding national security considerations.

The Administration's strategy is understandable. For to focus on the law, and on Turkey's continuing violation of the law through its continuing occupation of Cyprus, would make ending the embargo at this time unthinkable.

As a result, the Administration speaks of Turkey's importance to NATO and of the need to do whatever is necessary to preserve U.S. relations with Turkey.

We yield to no one in our support for NATO. Yet it is clear to us that, even on "national security" grounds, the Administration's current tilt toward Turkey is shortsighted and extremely dangerous to vital American security interests abroad.

We know that both Turkey and Greece are necessary for the security of NATO's southeastern flank; the Administration has conceded as much in its recent testimony before the House International Relations Committee. It is not, therefore, a question of choosing one country over the other—we must do all we can to insure that both participate fully in NATO.

As matters now stand, Turkey is a full member of NATO, while Greece has partially withdrawn from NATO as a result of U.S. mishandling of the Turkish invasion of Cyprus in 1974.

The Greek government has made it clear that it wishes to return to a full role in NATO, but that it cannot do so unless the embargo is maintained as a way to encourage a just settlement on Cyprus.

The Turkish government, meanwhile, has made it equally clear that it will remain in NATO regardless of the outcome of the embargo vote in Congress.

Therefore, a vote to continue the embargo is the only way to bring about the full participation of both Turkey and Greece in NATO. Statements made by the leaders of the two countries on their recent visits to Washington make this conclusion obvious.

Mr. Karamanlis told Members of Congress that, despite Administration claims to the contrary, a lifting of the embargo would be a major political issue in Greece, would further damage U.S.-Greek relations and would make the reintegration of Greece into NATO far more difficult. Mr. Karamanlis also revealed that a vote to lift the embargo—and the American abandonment of Greece such a vote would imply—could topple his pro-Western Government, with untold consequences for American security interests in that vital region of the world.

Mr. Ecevit, for his part, set forth Turkey's position quite plainly:

"We do not intend to leave NATO in any case, because we believe that the front in which we have a stake is based on a rather delicate balance, and Turkey has a responsibility to maintain that balance." (The Today Show, Interview held May 30, 1978)

And again:

BARBARA WALTERS. "Mr. Prime Minister, suppose the arms embargo is not lifted. Would you pull Turkey out of NATO?"

Mr. ECEVIT. "No, I have always said explicitly that we would still want to remain in NATO." (ABC Evening News, Interview held June 1, 1978)

Mr. Ecevit's statements should not be surprising. Mr. Ecevit knows that continued participation in NATO is to Turkey's benefit. He knows, too, that the embargo has not been as harmful to Turkey as some have claimed—Turkey has received more than $600 million in American military equipment for NATO purposes since the embargo began. And he knows, finally, that Turkey has been permitted since 1975 to purchase additional American-made equipment in unlimited amounts through U.S. commercial channels.

Yet, despite this, Administration officials have suggested that voting an end to the embargo is the only way to keep Turkey in NATO. In light of Mr. Ecevit's statements on this issue, these Administration claims are difficult to accept. We have, in fact, only two choices:

We can assume that Mr. Ecevit is telling the truth when he says that Turkey remains committed to NATO—in which case the Administration's arguments are groundless and Congress need not fear voting to maintain the embargo.

Or we can assume that he is not telling the truth—in which case the credibility of any of his commitments respecting Turkish flexibility on Cyprus or Turkey's reliability as an ally are themselves open to serious question, and Congress has no reason to lift the embargo.

The Administration simply cannot have it both ways, disputing Mr. Ecevit on this major concern and yet vouching for his reliability in all other respects.

We believe the statements of both Mr. Ecevit and Mr. Karamanlis on this issue: Turkey will remain in NATO regardless of the embargo vote, while Greece will only be able to rejoin NATO if the embargo is maintained. The need to have both Turkey and Greece play full roles in NATO leads to only one conclusion: that the embargo must be maintained.

We ask you, therefore, in the name of America's security interests abroad, to cast your vote in support of the Turkish arms embargo.

Sincerely,

COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

DEAR COLLEAGUE: This letter is in response to the third letter sent to you by the proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey. Their third letter addresses the interrelationship between the arms embargo and our national security.

Arguments made by the proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey:

1. The Administration's tilt toward Turkey is shortsighted and extremely dangerous to vital American security interests abroad;

2. A vote to continue the embargo is the only way to bring about the full participation of both Turkey and Greece in NATO.

Counter:

1. There is no "tilt" toward Turkey in United States policy.

We seek to lift the arms embargo against Turkey precisely because we seek to treat our two allies, Turkey and Greece, equally. Today there is an embargo against Turkey, but not Greece, and that is a "tilt" toward Greece.

2. The predominant—if not unanimous—view of defense experts and our defense leaders is that it is essential for our security interests to lift the embargo.

Five former Allied Commanders, all NATO members except Greece and almost all present and past United States military leaders support the lifting of the embargo. Both Presidents Ford and Carter support the lifting of the embargo.

3. The question before the Congress is not whether Turkey remains in NATO, but with what strength.

Turkey, with the second largest standing army in NATO, is of great importance to both the alliance and the United States. But the decline of Turkey's force since the embargo went into effect leaves all of southeastern Europe more vulnerable to Soviet penetration. Conservative intelligence estimates indicate that Turkish forces are today 40 percent combat effective and that if the embargo continues, by 1980 the combat forces in Turkey will be only 20 percent effective. It is doubtful now that the Turks can fulfill their NATO mission.

4. We need both Greece and Turkey in NATO and lifting the embargo is more likely to bring Greece back fully into NATO.

The argument that a vote to continue the embargo is the only way to bring about the full participation of both Turkey and Greece in NATO is patently wrong. The embargo is on today and the result is a severely weakened Turkey and a Greece which partially withdrew from NATO in 1974. We must pursue a policy which encourages both these valued friends and allies to participate fully in NATO, and that requires a policy that treats them equally.

5. Lifting the embargo is in the long term national interest of Greece and United States-Greece relations.

Lifting the embargo may cause short-term strains in our relationship with Greece, but putting behind us the complications of the embargo, which now serves as a wedge between us, will in the long run promote reconciliation between Greece and Turkey.

The Greek Government seeks to maintain a pro-West and pro-NATO stance and we should seek to reinforce those policies. By getting the embargo issue behind us and working for a Cyprus settlement, we will be able to restore trust and confidence to US-Greek relations

6. For both the short and the long run the strategic and military importance of Turkey cannot be minimized.

Since the embargo went into effect, our loss of intelligence on missile tests and troops movements in the Soviet Union has been significant. Our intelligence information in certain key areas covered from Turkey has been degraded by about fifty percent since 1975.

In addition, the strategically important Turkish land mass separates the Soviet Union from the Middle East and the Mediterranean. Today, well over 20 Soviet divisions are tied down by Greece and Turkey. The cooperation of both states is needed to inhibit the Warsaw Pact. Without the full commitment of Turkey to NATO and its full combat readiness, our national interest suffers measurably and American friends in the region, like Israel, are made more vulnerable.

The United States has many important national interests in the Eastern Mediterranean region and we need a carefully orchestrated set of policy initiatives in order to rebuild confidence and trust in our relations with Turkey, Greece and Cyprus. Lifting the embargo is only part of the answer. Striving for a Cyprus settlement is also part of the answer. What is essential is that we start now, with a new approach, to address the present unacceptable situation in the Eastern Mediterranean.

I hope that you agree and will vote to lift the arms embargo against Turkey.

Sincerely yours,

LEE H. HAMILTON, M.C.●

SALUTE OF JOHN ERICSSON AND SOLAR ENERGY

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, in a time when many still feel solar energy is exotic and will not be practical for many years into the future, I think it is important to share with my colleagues one of the many accomplishments of John Ericsson.

For today marks the 185th anniversary of the birth of the brilliant inventor who listed among his many contributions to mankind the Sun motor.

Ericsson, a man of great foresight, wrote in 1868:

I cannot omit adverting to the insignificance of the dynamic energy which the entire exhaustion of our coal fields would produce, compared with the incalculable amount of force at our command, if we avail ourselves of the concentrated heat of the solar rays.

He continued by writing:

It is true that the solar heat is often prevented from reaching the earth. On the other hand, the skillful engineer knows many ways of laying up a supply when the sky is clear and the great store-house is open, where the fuel may be obtained free of cost and transportation. At the same time, a great portion of our planet enjoys perpetual sunshine. The field therefore awaiting the application of the solar engine is almost beyond computation, while the source of its power is boundless. Who can foresee what influence an inexhaustible motive power will exercise on civilization, and the capability of the earth to supply the wants of our race?

It fascinates me to look back to the mid-19th century and see someone expounding on the potential good of solar commercialization.

We in Government are facing a critical stage in our country's development through the debate over a national energy plan. I hope we do not lose sight of Ericsson's words and deeds for we must make it our national policy to fully develop the vast potential of our greatest resource—the Sun.

Tapping this potential will take the dedication and ingenuity of both the public and private sectors, and only by working together can we realize the promise of this clean, inexhaustible resource.●

EDITORIAL SUPPORT FOR THE FOREIGN AID BILL

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, the foreign assistance appropriations bill will soon come before the House for consideration. As every Member is aware by now, numerous amendments will be offered to reduce funding and to restrict how our assistance may be used in a variety of ways.

I am opposed to these amendments, Mr. Speaker, and for the last week I have been inserting into the RECORD some examples of the many thoughtful and responsible editorials that have been published in newspapers across the Nation opposing these amendments.

Given the volume of editorials that have been written in support of the bill as reported from committee, it has been impossible to include all of them. However, for the benefit of those Members who may not be aware of the extent of editorial support for the bill, I am including in the RECORD at this time a list of newspapers that have indicated their support for it and their opposition to the various amendments that will be offered.

I might add that there is no way of knowing if this list is comprehensive. It includes only those editorials that have come to my attention:

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION SHOULD RELY ON LOCAL SMALL BUSINESSES

HON. KEITH G. SEBELIUS

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, small businesses in my district and around the country are becoming increasingly concerned because the U.S. General Services Administration (GSA) appears to be cutting back on the Federal Government's reliance on small firms for high technology commercial products.

If GSA goes ahead, Federal agencies will find themselves cut off from local repairs, local supplies of replacement parts, and local help in setting up and operating equipment.

Up until now, GSA has negotiated with manufacturers to gain special prices for Federal agency buyers. These prices are then published throughout the Government as the multiple awards schedule. Any manufacturer willing to give the Government a favorable discount is listed in the schedule. Under this multiple awards procedure, local Federal agency buyers purchase from a selection of models and prices. The multiple awards products are available from those local firms which represent the listed manufacturers. But GSA's Federal Supply Service is moving toward awarding sole-source contracts to one rather than a multiple of manufacturers and in doing so forcing Federal agencies to buy direct from the factory rather than through local dealers and distributors.

I feel strongly, as do many Members, that wherever possible, Federal agencies should buy locally. And because the multiple awards schedule gives a preset discount price, I see no reason why GSA should discontinue reliance on local companies as long as these companies adhere to the multiple awards schedule of discount prices.

Right now, this whole matter is being studied by the Office of Federal Procurement Policy (Office of Management and Budget) and the General Accounting Office. There is also legislation in the Senate (the Federal Acquisition Act, S. 1264, reported by the Senate Government Affairs Committee) which calls for greater reliance on small businesses for commercial off-the-shelf products.

Because of all of this study, I feel it is inadvisable for the GSA to make further switches fom the multiple awards schedule to single, sole-source awards. Therefore, I am introducing a bill which would place a 2-year moratorium on switches from the multiple awards schedule. This will assure that while the whole matter is being widely studied, Federal agencies will continue to purchase locally from small businesses, that GSA will be restrained from entering into cozy relationships with single manufacturers, and that rather than centralizing all Federal buying decisions under the GSA umbrella, individual agencies will have some latitude to select among items which can be bought at special Federal Government prices.●

NUCLEAR BALANCE MAY BE EVEN—DO RUSSIANS KNOW IT?

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, writing in the Chicago Tribune of July 25, Peter Reich, the internationally respected science columnist, discusses a subject which I deem especially important in light of strategic arms negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union. I commend the article to the attention of the Members:

NUCLEAR BALANCE MAY BE EVEN—DO RUSSIANS KNOW IT?

(By Peter Reich)

Remember the old story about the two guys who are walking in the park when a big, fierce-looking dog runs towards them?

"Don't worry," one guy reassures the other. "See, his tail's wagging. That's a sure sign he won't bite."

To which the other guy, unconvinced, replies, "I know that, and you know that—but does the dog?"

I was reminded of that when Sen. John Culver [D., Iowa] released an unclassified Central Intelligence Agency analysis of the Soviet Union's civil defense system the other day.

The analysis concluded, he said, that the Soviet civil defense system does not provide sufficient protection to encourage the U.S.S.R. to risk starting a nuclear war.

Specifically, Sen. Culver said, the study shows that Soviet civil defense efforts "are not sufficient to prevent millions of casualties and massive industrial damage in the event of a nuclear war."

Thus, the senator argued, "Soviet [civil defense] programs are not enough to tip the strategic balance against us."

The senator forgot to mention a few facts.

For example, it is generally agreed that the Soviet Union today has about 600 more intercontinental ballistic missiles on station, capable of hitting the United States, than we have ICBMs capable of striking them. What's more, the Soviet missiles are bigger, longer-ranged, and carry heavier, much more powerful nuclear warheads.

The Soviets also have pulled ahead of the United States in submarine launched ballistic missiles—an area in which we for many years had held the lead.

We still are ahead in manned, intercontinental-range bombers—but our Strategic Air Command's B–52s are aging fast, and, since President Carter decided not to build the B–1, we have nothing to replace them.

It seems to me, then, that when Sen. Culver talks about civil defense not tipping "the strategic balance against us," he forgets that the balance already teeters toward the Soviet side.

Ergo, how much more would it take to convince some future Soviet hothead that a nuclear war would be far less devastating for the Soviet Union than for the United States—and tempt him to push the button?

Sen. Culver also seems to forget that what really matters is not how much retaliatory force we have now, but how much we will have left after Russian missiles clobber us.

If a substantial portion of our land-based missiles, and at least some of our manned bombers, are wiped out by a Soviet first strike, is it not possible that the same hypothetical Russian hothead might conclude that the U.S.S.R.'s civil defense gives him just the edge he needs to come out ahead in a nuclear exchange?

"Despite widespread claims that Soviet leaders might launch a nuclear attack because they expect to suffer only moderate damage and few casualties . . . the professional judgment of our intelligence community is that they would not be emboldened to expose their country to a higher risk of nuclear attack," Sen. Culver asserts.

He contends that a U.S. retaliatory strike would "devastate the Soviet Union and kill more than 100 million people."

A lot of military people disagree. They figure United States dead would top 100 million, but they think Soviet casualties—because of such things as dispersal of factories, anti-missile missiles, very good anti-aircraft defense [including superb jet interceptors], plus civil defense measures—might turn out to be a lot less.

The Soviet Union, many people seem to have forgotten, suffered some 25 million dead in World War II.

Yet the country survived, and emerged victorious. So, how many casualties would its Communist leaders deem "acceptable" in a future war that could spell the end of the United States? ●

ARSON CONTROL IN SEATTLE

Hon. John E. (Jack) Cunningham

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, since I represent a portion of the city of Seattle, I point with pride to the greatest job done by our city in the field of arson control. One year ago, I was privileged to have a Seattle firefighter on my Washington, D.C., staff, Mr. Bob Clark of West Seattle. Bob acquainted me and my staff with the efforts of the city to control the growing disease of arson.

Now these efforts have been nationally recognized, in the Washington Post for July 29, 1978, in an article by Mr. Neal R. Pierce. In submitting his remarks to my colleagues and hope that we learn from this local community that all solutions do not, and cannot, come from Washington, D.C.:

[From the Washington Post, July 29, 1978]

IN SEATTLE "IF YOU START A FIRE, YOU'RE GOING TO GET CAUGHT"

(By Neal R. Peirce)

SEATTLE.—While headlines proclaim that arson is spreading like a prairie fire, this city has demonstrated how concerted action can dramatically reduce arson incidents and the losses to property—and often life—that go with it.

Only a handful of other cities—among them Houston, Los Angeles, New York's South Bronx, Boston and Lynn, Mass.—have launched anti-arson campaigns in any way comparable ot Seattle's. But the formula, explains City Councilman Randy Revelle, is deceptively simple:

"Make arson a priority crime. Establish a specialized arson unit within the fire department; combine its investigative work with that of the police department. Provide arson investigations training—that's absolutely critical. And involve local insurance companies and the media in anti-arson campaigns."

Richard Hargett, commander of "Marshal 5," the Seattle Fire Department's arson unit, says that by 1975 arson had become "the most serious problem facing the fire force." Between 1971 and 1974, losses in Seattle had soared from $621,000 to $3.2 million. It was feared they would hit $4.4 million in 1975.

But with its new program, Seattle reduced fire losses to $2.6 million in 1975. Last year the figure was down to only $1.7 million and will probably be less in 1978. Arson incidents were down while arrests and convictions went up: In 1974, there were 622 arson incidents, with only 73 arrests; last year, incidents were down to 518, arrests up to 217, and 196 of those arrests resulted in convictions.

Seattle's turnaround stands in stark contrast to the epidemic-like spread of arson nationwide. The insurance industry estimates that national losses last year were close to $4 billion, up from only $634 million in 1975 and a mere $68 million a decade before. Arson accounts for 40 percent of all property losses, the insurers believe, and now kills about 1,000 people a year and injures 10,000 more.

How did Seattle turn the table on the arsonists?

The credit begins with Fire Chief Frank Hansen, who reasoned that the causes of arson were so complex that no single "cure" would work. So he persuaded then-mayor Wes Uhlman to set up a task force including representatives of the city fire and police departments, the mayor and city council, the county prosecutor, Seattle Chamber of Commerce and the state's insurance council.

Early on, the task force discovered arsonists had good reason to believe they would get away with it. Nationally, for every 100 cases of known or suspected arson, only nine persons are arrested, only two are convicted and seldom is anyone actually jailed. The reason: Arson is difficult to detect because incriminating evidence, such as fingerprints, is often destroyed in the fire.

But Hansen publicly laid down the gauntlet to would-be arsonists. Many city and private agencies would be watching them, he said. "From now on, if you start a fire, you're going to get caught And when you're caught, you're going to jail."

Delivering on that promise required tackling a problem that has plagued effective anti-arson work everywhere, lack of cooperation between police and fire departments. Typically both agencies claim authority, but neither gives arson proper attention or manpower.

Fire fighters rarely have the investigative skills to solve the more sophisticated cases, and police find arson "unglamorous" compared with robbery and murder. Jurisdictional confusion means neither department pursues arson to the point of prosecution.

Hansen solved the problem by convincing the police to give the fire department authority over arson from initial investigation through prosecution. But he persuaded the police to assign to the fire department two detectives to assist in investigations. Police/fire department tensions melted away; today, police and fire fighters share tips on arson and other crimes and the police often back up the fire department with assistance in surveillance and stakeouts and use of police helicopters, district patrol cars and communications systems.

Training for all arson-squad members includes basic law-enforcement techniques and sophisticated crime labwork. The Marshal 5 squad investigates all fires causing over $1,000 damage, and can crack seemingly insolvable arson cases. "Arsonists tend to believe they have destroyed all traces of their crime in the flames; what they fail to realize and what gives us the edge is that the very ashes that are left are where we find our clues," says Inspector Jack Higham.

The motives for arson are several: A business competitor or a disgruntled employee or even a shunned lover may seek revenge. A burglar or murderer may try to cover up another crime. A child playing with matches may be mentally disturbed or making a bid for attention. A would-be "hero" may set fires to receive accolades for discovering them. "Arson is just another means of assault," Hargett says. "It's less risky—there's no face-to-face conflict. The chances of being identified are almost nil."

Finally, there's arson for profit by financially troubled businessmen or homeowners seeking to collect insurance money. Despite the publicity surrounding such events as the arrest of 33 "respected" Bostonians in an arson ring last year, the number of fraud fires is actually small. But the dollar losses are great.

Seattle attacked the motives one by one. Since 50 percent of Seattle fires were set by juveniles, reaching them was a top priority. A United Way agency was hired to counsel children who displayed an "unusual" interest in fire; the fire department created an "arson rat" as the symbol of arsonists and received more than 5,000 entries in a campaign to name him. The winning entry: "Sinder Sid."

Neighborhoods and business districts with high arson rates were identified; each night between 11 p.m. and 3 a.m. fire fighters travel through them in highly visible vehicles, clearly marked "Community Fire Alert/Arson Patrol." The patrol operates on tips from private citizens, employees of ailing businesses, or health and liquor inspectors who may learn that a bar or restaurant owner is contemplating arson. "If we've been given a tip a building might burn or see four garbage-can fires in a small area, it's often a way for us to catch arsonists and put out a fire quickly," Hargett says. The presence of vehicles with red lights on top and spotlights makes some residents nervous, "but we want everyone to know they're there," he adds.

Insurance companies agreed to withhold payment of large-loss fire claims when the policyholder may have been responsible. And the benefits of the Seattle effort spread statewide when the insurance industry set up a $5,000 pot to reward "secret witnesses" and underwrote a statewide toll-free arson hotline. The program is particularly valuable to small towns where residents often don't know who to call to report information, or are afraid of being traced.

Finally, Seattle newpapers and television stations cooperated in a long-term publicity campaign about the arson problem and the success of investigations. A four-week television series on arson produced by a local station even won an award for investigative reporting.

But the cost to the taxpayers of the entire Seattle effort is only $100,000 a year. It's an investiment even the most ferocious taxpayers' association might find worthwhile.●

AIRCRAFT NOISE REDUCTION EFFORT SUPPORTED BY 2,500 PILOTS

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, It is important that I call the attention of the House to a telegram which I have received today concerning H.R. 8729, the Airport and Aircraft Noise Reduction Act; and H.R. 11986, which the Rules Committee is considering as title III of H.R. 8729. The telegram is indicative of the broad support this bill has among labor as well as industry and public officials. The telegram follows:

NEW YORK, N.Y.,
July 27, 1978.

Hon. GLENN M. ANDERSON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

2,500 pilots of Pan-Am urge your support for H.R. 8729 and H.R. 11986 as written.

FDA'S PROPOSED RESTRICTIONS ON ANTIBIOTICS: CONGRESS OBJECTIVES—PART III

HON. CHARLES ROSE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to submit the first part of a report, "Antibiotics in Animal Feeds: Risk vs. Benefit," outlining the history of FDA's proposed restrictions on the subtherapeutic use of antibiotics in animal feed. The information contained in this very well-done editorial feature was distributed by Watt Publishing Co., and written by Ian McNett and R. Frank Frazier. It speaks for itself. Part IV shall present the second part of this report dealing with the scientific and economic concerns:

ANTIBIOTICS IN FEED: RISK VERSUS BENEFIT

PROPOSED BAN—A VEXING MAZE OF POLITICS, SCIENCE, AND ECONOMICS

Dr. Donald Kennedy, FDA Commissioner: "Our actions should be viewed as a first step toward FDA's ultimate goal of eliminating, to the extent possible, non-therapeutic use in animals of any drugs needed to treat disease in man."

The U.S. Food & Drug Administration is proposing restrictions on the use of antibiotics in animal feed.

Some experts think these restrictions threaten modern, mechanized production of poultry and red meat. Producers would have to spend more for feed and consumers would have to pay more for meat, even though the quality would be lower. This would contribute to inflation.

As with any issue concerning food and human health, this one stands a good chance of becoming obscurred in a blizzard of fear, rhetoric, and supposition. But, the basic question remains: Do the health and economic benefits of using antibiotics in animal feed outweigh the risks to human health of their continued use?

The proposed restrictions of penicillin and the tetracyclines have already prompted three Congressional hearings, a study by the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment, a request for another study by the National Academy of Sciences, threats of court action, and a great deal of concern in the poultry, meat, and animal health industries.

The controversy probably will last several years before the administrative and judicial machinery grinds to a conclusion.

The economic implications are substantial.

One integrated broiler producer and processor from Maryland's Eastern Shore estimates that the proposed regulation of penicillin, which he uses in broiler feed, would increase his costs by $100,000 annually.

Robert K. Wagstaff told the Dairy and Poultry Subcommittee of the House Agriculture Committee that costs would increase $600,000 if penicillin and tetracyclines could not be used in the treatment of broilers, and if substitutes were not available. Wagstaff is executive vice president of Golden Pride, Inc., Berlin, Md. He estimated that the subtherapeutic (low level) use of a variety of antibiotic compounds yielded annual economic benefits of $4,778,000 to Golden Pride, Inc.

FDA'S JUSTIFICATION

Just eight days after he assumed office, FDA Commissioner Donald Kennedy announced that he had decided to restrict the use of penicillin and tetracyclines in animal feed, although the process leading to his decision had been in the works for seven years. Dr. Kennedy said, "The theoretical possibility that drug-resistant pathogens can be produced by antibiotic selection has become a real threat with the emergence of human disease (typhoid and childhood meningitis) caused by ampicillin- and chloramphenicol-resistant Salmonella and Haemophilus.

"The point is," he continued, "that known routes of transfer exist by which antibiotic use in animals can contribute to such threats."

However, Dr. Kennedy said he was not suggesting that typhoid and childhood meningitis were caused by strains of bacteria that gained their resistance through the use of antibiotics in animal feeds.

THE BRIEF FOR CONTINUED USE

Representatives of the meat production industry, animal health scientists, and the drug industry, claim that Dr. Kennedy's hypothesis is refuted by more than 25 years' experience in the use of antibiotics in animal feed.

"So far as we are aware, there is no evidence that these low-level uses, which have been practiced for nearly 30 years, have created any human hazards," Edward H. Covell, chairman of the board, National Broiler Council, testified before the Dairy and Poultry Subcommittee.

Apparently, the antibiotics do not even cause long-term resistance in animals that eat them. Thomas H. Jukes, professor of medical physics, University of California, said, ". . . When we first started to use (antibiotics) I thought that they would be only good for a year or two and then resistance would catch up and their use would die off. However, to our astonishment, for some reason this did not happen. The animals kept responding year after year."

Dr. Kennedy conceded that "we can point to no specific instance in which human disease is more difficult to treat because drug resistance has arisen from an animal source." He maintains however, that "it is likely such problems could have gone unnoticed."

Dr. C. D. Van Houweling, director, FDA's Bureau of Veterinary Medicine, speculates that the bacteria which become resistant may not be the ones on which antibiotics work to produce a growth effect. He cited experiments in which oxytetracycline was fed in the same pig operation for 15 years. "The results at the tail end were as good as at the beginning; there was no evidence of reduced effectiveness," Van Houweling said in an interview.

THE NEXT STEPS

The proposals to restrict the use of penicillin and tetracyclines are merely a step along a road that we took seven years ago. We could continue down this road for another six years. Publication of the proposed regulations in the Federal Register gives affected parties an opportunity to ask for hearings.

Manufacturers of affected products almost certainly will request hearings, according to Fred Holt, executive vice president of the Animal Health Institute, a trade association of companies that manufacture animal drugs.

Dr. Van Houweling has said that the FDA would prefer not to hold hearings. It must determine whether the issue raised is sufficiently material to justify holding hearings, he said.

Despite its reluctance, FDA now feels it must hold hearings anyway. When it decided not to hold hearings on withdrawing approval for the use of DES (diethylstilbestrol, a synthetic hormone which causes cancer in rats when used in high concentrations) its decision was successfully challenged in court.

The hearings could stretch out for a year or two, Dr. Van Houweling said. After all the facts were presented, an administrative law judge would make a recommendation to the Commissioner, who could accept or reject it. Any final decision by the Commissioner could be challenged in court. Once into the judicial process, with many opportunities for delay and appeal, another three or five years could be consumed before the issue was finally resolved, Dr. Van Houweling said.

Commissioner Kennedy announced his decision April 15, 1977. Within the next few months the following Congressional actions occurred:

Rep. Charles Rose (D-N.C.), chairman of the House Agriculture Dairy and Poultry Subcommittee, held three days of hearings on antibiotics and other food issues.

Sen. Herman Talmadge (D-Ga.), chairman of the Senate Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry Committee, asked the Office of Technology Assessment to undertake a thorough study of the use of drugs and chemicals as feed additives.

Rep. John Moss (D-Calif.) held hearings before his House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations on the FDA's regulation of antibiotics used in animal feed. Chairman Rose was among those who testified.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) held hearings September 21 and 22 in his Senate Agriculture Subcommittee on Agricultural Research and General Legislation.

The General Accounting Office issued a report that sharply criticized FDA for moving too slowly on the issue of antibiotics-in-feed. In addition, GAO criticized FDA for using its National Advisory Food & Drug Committee to study and make recommendations on a technical issue. The committee was created to deliberate on broader policy ranges, the GAO report said. The GAO investigation and report had been requested by Rep. Moss.

HOUSE SUBCOMMITTEE HEARINGS

Chairman Rose characterized his hearings as a fact-finding effort. Witnesses were invited from FDA, from the dairy, poultry and red meat industries, from drug companies, from consumer groups, and from the agricultural scientific community. Rose said he believes "there should be a clear ability for the poultry business and agribusiness generally to use antibiotics and other necessary drugs in feeding animals."

Rose said in a key point emerged in the hearings: "Dr. Kennedy feels that while there has been no evidence of resistant pathogens harmful to humans resulting from the subtherapeutic feeding of antibiotics to animals over the past quarter century, there is a theoretical possibility that it could occur and that therefore he has a moral responsibility to guard against that theoretical possibility.

"As a member of the legislative branch, my immediate reaction to that has been and still is that God help us if the executive branch is now setting forth to save us from theoretical possibilities and not from clear and present dangers that are currently in front of us."

Chairman Rose said he plans no further hearings, but would not be "bashful" about holding more if the situation called for it. He said he asked the National Academy of Sciences/National Research Council to study the issue with funding support from the U.S. Department of Agriculture. The Academy was willing to do the study, but USDA asked that it wait until other studies now under way are completed. Rose also asked the Office of Technology Assessment to evaluate what impact the proposed ban would have on the dairy and poultry industries.

THE OTA ASSESSMENT

Congress established the Office of Technology Assessment (OTA) to provide it with objective, scientific information about important technological issues. Behind the establishment of the OTA was a suspicion of the objectivity of executive branch experts, on whom Congress had relied in the past for scientific information.

The OTA study of animal feed additives will be a broad-gauged investigation of the benefits and risks. Principal investigator for the study is Dr. T. C. Byerly, a prominent animal health scientist, who formerly served as USDA's Assistant Director for Science and Education.

OTA will analyze thoroughly the available evidence on the benefits and risks of using drugs as feed additives. In a major departure the OTA will analyze the economic impact that banning the use of drugs in feed will have on the structure of the poultry and meat industry.

Walter Wilcox, project leader of the OTA study, said it would have three aspects: "One, we will try to integrate and look at all the information, both pro and con, all at once, not just one side. Two, we will try to get all the latest information, published or unpublished. And three, we will try and make a better benefit/risk evaluation than has ever been done."

J. B. Cordaro, program manager of the study and the first draft of the study would be ready by the end of March, with the final draft expected in late June, 1978. The report will list the options open to Congress for improving regulations of drugs used as animal feed additives.

The persons interviewed for this article were not prepared to say in what direction legislation affecting the regulation of feed additives might go. While not commenting on specific legislative proposals, Cordaro noted that the question of antibiotics in animal feeds was part of a larger issue that embraced the use of saccharine, environmental contaminants, and other drugs.

Cordaro said, "The danger as I see it is that in every instance where there is a specific chemical or a specific food additive, Congress will set itself up as the arbiter and try to legislate. My personal judgement is that that's not the way the issue ought to be handled."

THE CONTENDERS

The issue of antibiotics in animal feeds has been chewed over for a half dozen years, but not much interest has been evoked from the public, the press, or consumer groups. No consumer or environmental advocates turned up at the Dairy and Poultry Subcommittee hearings or a September, 1977 public proceeding of OTA. Chairman Rose said he had heard no "consumer outcry," demanding the regulation of antibiotics in animal feed.

Generally, the issue has pitted the Food and Drug Administration against the animal production and animal health industries. Knowledgable observers in Washington expect Commissioner Kennedy to stick to his guns on the issue.

Representatives of the poultry, red meat, and animal health industries turned out in force for the Dairy and Poultry Subcommittee hearings and the OTA proceeding. They can be expected to fight the FDA proposals to the last ditch.

The political climate in the country and in Washington has changed substantially in the 25 years since antibiotics were first used in animal feeds.

The past 10 years have witnessed the growth of the environmental and consumer movements.

Consumer advocates represent both a danger and an opportunity for those who benefit from the use of antibiotics in animal feed. Consumers are interested in health and pocketbook issues. A few years ago, consumers were picketing supermarkets in a protest against high meat prices, which are likely to occur again if the use of antibiotics is severely restricted.

Carol Forbes, counsel to the House Dairy and Poultry Subcommittee, said she believes that consumers can be reached on the antibiotic issue. She noted the need to distinguish between synthetic chemical food additives that are potentially cancer-producing and antibiotics which occur in nature and do not cause cancer.

In addition to the volatile potential represented by consumer advocates, there is another trend in the political climate. That is a questioning of the scope, powers and roles of the regulatory agencies. Indeed, there are proposals to break up FDA by sending its food divisions to USDA. In addition, there is a sizeable and growing body of opinion that the federal government does entirely too much regulating. This is balanced by a large body of opinion that more, not less, regulation is needed to protect consumers from dangers, health hazards and fraud in an increasingly complex society and economy.

Generally, the forecast for the feed additive issue is an extended period of political turbulence. There will be conflicting viewpoints on the scientific, economic, legal and political aspects of the issue. From these conflicting views the public must sort out the facts.●

AMERICAN PRODUCTIVITY

HON. JOHN J. RHODES

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, the July 31 issue of the Washington Post has in its lead editorial laid out in a concise way the very serious problem of declining productivity in American industry.

The Post notes that we are dropping behind other countries, at a time of stiffening competition from abroad. The editorial expresses concern over deteriorating productivity, a view that I have been espousing for some time.

The Post piece is an excellent capsulized summary of this alarming trend in our productivity. I urge my colleagues to read this review, and to note particularly that the Post suggests that Congress may want to cut the capital gains tax to stimulate investment in productive facilities.

Text of the Post editorial is as follows:

AMERICAN PRODUCTIVITY

Throughout most of the years since World War II, productivity in the American economy has risen briskly. As it went up, it carried with it people's earnings and standards of living. But the rise began to slacken about a decade ago, and for the past year and a half there has been hardly any rise at all. Of, all the changes overtaking the American economy, the behavior of productivity is one of the most peculiar—and one of the most disquieting.

The immediate consequence of no productivity gains is that inflation will become harder than ever to control. But if the present pattern continues, it will also ignite uncomfortable political questions about dividing the pie in a country that has come to expect, and to count on, steady increases in both public and private wealth. Nobody really knows why productivity has stopped rising. All explanations are, to one degree or another, speculative. But the evidence suggests that it is no minor passing blip on the chart. The causes seem to lie deep in the changing structure of the national economy.

Productivity is simply the average output per hour of labor. The Labor Department computes it every three months, and it has just published the figures for the spring quarter of this year. They show that productivity was rising at the minuscule rate of 0.1 percent a year, after having fallen during the winter. Through the 1950's and most of the 1960's, it was going up at an impressive pace of nearly 3 percent a year. In the years after 1968, the trend dropped to half that rate Since late 1976, it has been almost flat.

That departure is consistent with two other surprises. Inflation has been running considerably higher in recent months than most people expected, and unemployment has been considerably lower. Output over the past year has been raised by putting more people on payrolls, not by improving each person's capacity to produce.

It's a striking departure, and one explanation may well lie in the rather low rates at which business has been investing new capital. That, in turn, may be the result of low profits. Another possibility is the cost of the new environmental and safety rules, requiring industry to invest heavily in equipment to control air and water pollution.

Whatever the influences controlling productivity, they vary enormously from one country to another. In international competition, the United States is currently not doing well. The following brief table compares the increases in productivity in manufacturing, for the decade 1967–77, among some of the major industrial powers:

United States 27 percent, France 72, West Germany 70, Italy 62, Japan 107, Canada 43, Great Britain 27.

There is a tendency in this country to regard Britain as the world's great example of industrial decline. But you will note that the rate of productivity gain in British factories over the past 10 years has been the same as in American factories.

Since no one is quite sure why the American rate has fallen, no one is in a position to offer a sure remedy. But these latest productivity figures may well strengthen the impulse in Congress to cut taxes on capital gains, in an effort to increase investment. Beyond that, it's also necessary to consider the possibility that some of this change may lie beyond the reach of government policy. A good many Americans' ideas about work, incomes and economic growth began to change around 1968. These new attitudes may now be showing up in the statistics on the nation's economic performance.●

GOLD MEDAL STUDENTS RECEIVE GOLD MEDAL

HON. J. HERBERT BURKE

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. BURKE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this year the eighth world music contest was held in Kerkrade, Holland, during the separate periods of June 24 to 25, July 1 to 2, 8 to 9, and 15 and 16. The World Music Festival lasted nearly a month and is held every 4 years under the auspices of the National and International Music Federations. It is with great pride, Mr. Speaker, for me to have in my congressional district the South Broward High School which is located in Hollywood, Fla. The South Broward High School band and its Browardettes drill team participated in the World Music Festival this year and was a gold medal winner.

The hard work of the teachers, students, parents, and the many others which resulted in this victory is to be commended. In fact, it is with great pride that I, myself, am able to tell my colleagues of this outstanding achievement and the winning of this gold medal by the students of the South Broward High School marching band and drill team, since in doing so they had to compete with 27 other bands from throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy for me and others, to congratulate and to offer our plaudits to these young people who won this honor, but I am sure all of my colleagues know that champions become champions because of their desire, hard work, and willingness to overcome the many difficult obstacles that are placed in their paths. Champions, in other words, are not born, they are molded together by desire, and hard work, and by overcoming those who say "It cannot be done." The champions that I am talking about had to raise funds for their trip. They had to plan and work long and hard, not only by practicing, but by participating in many community fundraising affairs. To raise the money needed for their transportation, the students and members of the band as well as others held car washes, spaghetti dinners, participated in raising art objects for sale at flea markets and solicited moneys from public and private groups. I am sure the thrill of winning at this international competition will be a lifelong memory for all the students, parents, and teachers who participated and cannot be replaced, and thus, the effort was well worth every ounce expended. The students while on tour visited Holland, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, and Austria; and in each town and place they visited they gave performances in the town square which brought happiness and delight to thousands of people who came to see this great high school band and drill team from the United States. The students, as young people generally are, were warm, friendly, and exuberant and their attitude indicated their pride in themselves and in the country from whence they came.

Mr. Speaker, as I stated, in order to become a champion, it takes hard work and with this group of young people this was no exception. Before they could even participate in the World Music Festival in Holland, where they won a gold medal, they had to first participate and win in competition with other bands from the United States. It was from this participation and competition with these other bands that they were selected as one of the 10 outstanding school bands in the United States and was thereby justifiably invited to participate in the World Music Festival contest. In winning the gold medal, they did so by outperforming 27 other bands from nations throughout the world. And finally, during the performances on July 8 and 9 in the finals, they openly disclosed their own mettle by winning the gold medal over the other 27 bands from throughout the world. Thus, the 178 students who participated with the South Broward High School Band and Browardettes Drill Team brought everlasting fame not only to their own high school but to the city of Hollywood, Fla., and indeed, to the entire United States. But the students alone, like all champions had to be molded in the crucible of champions by others and in this case by, Edward Parsons, the band director, and by Lynn Baker, the drill team director, and by Elizabeth Bousfield, principal of South Broward High School. I am confident the students will agree that without the guidance of so many outstanding people, Edward Parsons, Lynn Baker, and Elizabeth Bousfield, and the assistance and guidance of so many others that their victory which they so gallantly won would not have been possible.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride, therefore, that I congratulate these outstanding students of South Broward High School, Edward Parsons their band director; Lynn Baker, director of the Browardettes Drill Team and the other faculty members, students, directors, parents and the many boosters who helped in so many ways not only in raising funds for the trip, but also by the love and encouragement which made this outstanding feat possible for the champions.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I submit herewith the separate names of the South Broward High School Band students and the South Broward High School Browardettes majorettes and to each individually, I extend my sincere congratulations. The names of those who are individually and as a group, champion "gold medal" winners in their own right are:

WHY DOES $2.20 PER BUSHEL CORN FROM IOWA SUDDENLY BECOME WORTH $6 IN ROTTERDAM?

HON. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Speaker, as we all know, agricultural exports make a sizable and significant positive contribution to the balance of payments of the United States. Exports are important to farmers in Iowa and other parts of the country. However, the question keeps coming up as to why corn which sells for $2.20 per bushel in Iowa sells for $6 per bushel in Rotterdam. An excellent article appeared in the July 22, 1978, edition of the Iowa Farm Bureau Spokesman addressing this subject. The article details the costs associated with the various marketing phases needed to get corn from Iowa to Rotterdam, Japan, and Odessa, Russia. It is important to note the variable levy applied by the European Economic Community which keeps the price of corn arriving in Rotterdam at $6 per bushel no matter what it sells for in Iowa. The text of the article follows:

WHY DOES $2.20 PER BUSHEL CORN FROM IOWA SUDDENLY BECOME WORTH $6 IN ROTTERDAM

(By Robert N. Wisner, C. Phillip Baumel and John A. Wallize)

After finishing corn planting in May, a Greene county farmer's attention turned to old crop corn still in storage. Prices had moved up a bit and he'd heard a nearby elevator was buying corn for shipment to Europe.

The bid at the local elevator was $2.20 per bushel in mid-May. But the Greene county farmer learned of another price from a market report in his reading materials that had accumulated during the planting season. That item was the price of corn in Rotterdam—the destination for corn he was selling to a nearby elevator. Rotterdam prices were an astonishing $6 per bushel.

How could his corn sell in Europe for almost three times as much as the local price? He wondered and asked questions.

The Greene county farmer asked enough questions to reach the Iowa Farm Bureau headquarters in Des Moines and marketing specialists at Iowa State University. The main question: How can corn from West Central Iowa sell for more than $6 per bushel in Rotterdam?

Here's the answer: First, after paying the farmer $2.20 for the corn, the country elevator must add 5 to 10 cents per bushel as a merchandising margin. This margin covers interest, insurance and handling costs of the corn, any shrinkage or change in grade that may occur, taxes, labor expenses, penalties the elevator must pay for late delivery, overhead costs and, of course, the elevator's profit.

The merchandising margin varies with transportation and supply-demand conditions, and in mid-May was a bit larger than usual. A shortage of railroad cars was creating the risk of penalities for late deliveries. In addition, country elevators faced increased storage costs and lower export bids for shipments that would be delayed to 8 weeks. Merchandising margins tended to increase to cover these added costs. Margins shown in Table 1 are based on reports from trade sources and are believed to be reasonably typical, but may not cover all situations.

UNIT TRAINS

Usually, the least expensive way to move large volumes of grain from Central and Western Iowa to Rotterdam is by 75-car rail shipments to the Gulf of Mexico export elevators. In May, the 75-car rail rate to the Gulf was 37.2 cents per bushel from West Central Iowa. This rate increased to 38.6 cents per bushel on June 17.

Not all Iowa elevators can use the 75-car rates. Some may have the rate available, but don't have the facilities to load that many cars. If the elevator must ship at a more costly rate, the elevator operator has to either reduce merchandising margins or reduce bids to farmers—or a combination of the two.

In May, the 50-car rate from West Central Iowa to the Gulf was 39.5 cents—2.3 cents per bushel higher; the 25-car rate was 42.3 cents or 5.1 cents per bushel more than the 75-car rate; and the single car rate was 47.3 cents or more than 10 cents a bushel higher. These rates increased about 2 cents per bushel on June 17.

The elevator assembling the Rotterdam shipment was using the 75-car rate. But with its merchandising margin and freight to the Gulf, the cost of $2.20 corn rose to $2.67 per bushel as it arrived at the Gulf port by rail.

EXPORT ELEVATOR

At the export elevator, additional costs and marketing margins are involved. The port elevator's markup is much like the country elevator's merchandising margin—except that costs can be higher. Markups at this point cover demurrage—a charge beyond the time allowed for loading and unloading or sailing on ships waiting to be loaded, demurrage on rail cars or barges waiting to be unloaded, the costs of receiving, handling, inspecting, official grading and loading out the grain, as well as interest, insurance and overhead costs, shrinkage and grade changes.

There's also the export elevator profit and costs of required air pollution control equipment. Trade sources indicate marketing margins at the Gulf generally range from 8 to 22 cents per bushel for corn. Here again, strong demand, limited handling capacity and transportation problems boost costs and tend to widen the margins.

In mid-May, marketing margins at Gulf ports reportedly were at or near the upper end of this range because of heavy shipments and transportation problems. The loss of two Gulf port elevators from explosions last December also increased congestion at the remaining elevators and contributed to wider than normal margins.

Table 1 spells out the costs of moving grain from West Central and Eastern Iowa to three overseas destinations. This article concentrates on the second column of that table—moving grain from West Central Iowa to Rotterdam via the Gulf of Mexico.

The other columns provide comparisons on cost to Japan and Russia. Transportation from Eastern Iowa to the Gulf is based on unregulated truck-barge rates, which fluctuate with changing supply and demand conditions.

Total costs for the Greene county corn were about $2.89 per bushel at the export elevator as it was being loaded into ships in mid-May.

Next, ocean freight must be added to get the grain to foreign buyers. In mid-May corn could be moved from the Gulf of Mexico to Rotterdam for just over 15 cents a bushel. It cost nearly 29 cents to move it to Japan and about 41 cents to Odessa, Russia, on the Black Sea in United States' flag ships. Shipping cost to Odessa via foreign flag lines generally would be about 5 cents per bushel cheaper.

Our grain from Greene county is now approaching Rotterdam and is valued at more than $3 per bushel.

At Rotterdam, another markup is added at the receiving elevator—an unloading charge. Trade sources indicate it ranges from 8 to 20 cents per bushel and involves costs similar to those encountered at U.S. ports.

Figuring the maximum costs within the ranges given, the $2.20 corn from Greene county is now valued at nearly $3.25 a bushel in the elevator at Rotterdam. That's still considerably below the $6 per bushel our Greene county farmer heard about. But there's one more charge to come.

VARIABLE LEVY

The final charge is a $2.77 variable levy or import tax applied to corn imported into the European Economic Community (EEC—or the Common Market). The basic goal of the EEC levy is to protect farmers and agriculture in nine Western European countries. A specific goal is to keep corn at about $6 per bushel in the EEC.

The system works well for the Europeans. Adding the $2.77 levy—which varies with world price—the $2.20 Iowa corn is now priced at $6.01 per bushel in elevators at the receiving port of Rotterdam.

When world prices go down, the EEC variable levy goes up to keep EEC corn prices at the $6 per bushel level. Consequently, reduced transportation costs make U.S. grain more competitive in most areas of the world—but in the European Common Market. Without the variable levy, U.S. corn could have been sold at about half the domestic EEC price in mid-May.

Ultimate goal of the duty and $6 corn is to encourage more grain production in Europe. Nearly doubling the price of imported grain is expensive for European consumers. But Europeans are willing to make that sacrifice and subsidize agriculture in order to gain self-sufficiency in production.

EEC SUBSIDY

There are a number of reasons for the EEC subsidization. First, European agriculture consists of many small farms. So there's a larger percentage of farmers in the population, compared to the United States, to back the import duty.

Also, the subsidization has existed long enough that corn prices are now capitalized into land values. This, too, provides great resistance to change.

Finally, many European consumers have experienced risks in addition to those of the Greene county farmer. Twice in this century, the continent has been the scene of the world wars. Consequently, Europeans may place a higher value upon food security and self-sufficiency in agriculture than their U.S. counterparts.

For the Greene county farmer, exports represent the most rapidly growing area of demand for corn in recent years. Exports, along with domestic feeding, production and government price support programs are the key elements in grain prices. Since exports influence the ability to maintain higher grain prices in the U.S., farmers oppose any restrictions that tend to limit exports.

In Europe, of course, there are different attitudes and values. Those differences spell $2.20 corn in Greene county and $6.01 in Rotterdam.●

ANDREW YOUNG DOES NOT LIE

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, in the wake of the recent controversy over Ambassador Young's remarks on political prisoners in the United States, my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio, LOUIS STOKES, has written a hard-hitting, intuitive commentary in support of Ambassador Young. So that my colleagues in the House can share its message, I submit to you Mr. STOKES' editorial piece which appeared in the July 27, 1978, edition of the Cleveland Plain Dealer:

REPRESENTATIVE STOKES: "YOUNG DOESN'T LIE"

(By LOUIS STOKES)

A newspaper article said White House press secretary Jody Powell hinted that U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young will have to clear future statements on human rights with the White House. The article said Young was reprimanded by President Carter for telling a French newspaper there are "hundreds, even thousands of political prisoners" in American jails.

I find this disturbing. Had the President reprimanded Ambassador Young for lying I would understand his reprimand. I do not understand how President Carter can, pursuant to his policy of human rights, express strong objection to the trials of Scharansky and Ginzburg in the Soviet Union for speaking out against their government and simultaneously squelch Andy Young for criticizing his government.

We cannot have one human rights policy for the residents of the Soviet Union and another for our own country. Lost in the hue and cry for Andy to be reprimanded, silenced, impeached or fired in the fact that no one has refuted him on any issue.

When examined, it is apparent that now, as on previous occasions, the hue and cry is not over Andy telling untruths; it is that he spoke at a time when Cyrus Vance was beginning the SALT talks and President Carter was decrying the trials of Soviet dissidents Scharansky and Ginzburg.

One also cannot ignore the element of racism in the zealousness of the attack on Young. If not racism, then why was there was not a similar uproar from the media when the author of Nixon's benign neglect policy toward blacks, former Ambassador Daniel Patrick Moynihan, on occasion after occasion embarrassed the United States by using his U.N. forum to insult Third World nations?

Let us now examine some of Young's previous statements which created such a furor in the press. In each case, it is necessary to note that in spite of the uproar, nobody has yet to call him a liar.

On one occasion, he was assailed for calling former Presidents Nixon and Ford racists. On that occasion as now, the media chose to take his statement out of context. What Andy said was Nixon and Ford "were racists not in the aggressive sense but in that they had no understanding of the problems of colored peoples anywhere."

But what if he did call them racists? What's wrong with that?

It was Nixon who had this writer and 11 other black congressmen on his enemies list.

It was Nixon who didn't have a single black in his cabinet. It was Nixon who in spite of his boasts of expertise in foreign affairs didn't even have an African policy.

And what about Gerald Ford who during 25 years in Congress became a leader in offering crippling and dismantling amendments to every piece of civil rights legislation ever passed? As president, he too did not even have an African policy.

That's what Andy meant when he said that "they had no understanding of the problems of colored peoples anywhere."

Let's examine another of his statements which caused consternation. He is supposed to have insulted Great Britain by making reference of its having a history of racism. Well, history tells me that it was the British themselves who boasted that "the sun never sets on the British Empire." It is not a lie that Britain colonized people of other colors from Africa to Asia to Hong Kong.

And now let's examine Andy Young's statement that the South Africa government is illegitimate. Well, isn't that the tuth? What else is it when 2.3 million whites rule 26 million blacks in their own country? What is legitimate about the policy of apartheid?

What is legitimate about denying 26 million blacks citizenship in their own country and confining them to sections of their own country designated as "Homelands"?

Now let us examine the current controversy. In an interview in a French newspaper Young is alleged to have said, "After all, in our prisons there are also hundreds, maybe even thousands of people I would call political prisoners."

He continued: "Ten years ago, I was sentenced myself in Atlanta for organizing a protest movement. And three years later I was in the Georgia legislature. It's true things don't change so quickly in the Soviet Union, but they do change there, too."

According to the article, the ambassador also said: "While there is nobody in prison in the United States for criticizing the government, there are all varieties of political prisoners." In support of this, Young is alleged to have further said: "In the United States people can be in prison much more because they are poor than because they are bad. But that's a problem we are working on and one on which we are making great progress."

Now if his critics are contending that he lied, about what did he lie? If, on the other hand, it is the contention of his critics that he told the truth, but he just should not have told it right now, then we are confronted with an entirely different matter.

Young has had the extraordinary experience of being a black man in a racist society who rose to the top. He didn't rise to the top by mouthing what somebody told him to say, and I predict that if he is ever told what he must say, he will quit.

No one can refute his statement that he has been in jail and has himself been a political prisoner in America. No one can deny that Dr. Martin Luther King and hundreds of civil rights activists in the 1960s were jailed as political prisoners in America, and no one in his right mind can deny the ugly truth that today in America there are jails full of poor people, a majority of whom are black.

Many of those are guilty of no crime except that of being black and poor. The Amnesty International report for 1977 verifies Young's statement that there are political prisoners in jails in America. Whether their figures agree with Young's as to the number of political prisoners in American jails is really not important. The fact is that this Nobel Peace Prize organization corroborates the ambassador's basic premise.

The tragedy which we cannot hide from the world, even by firing, muzzling and gagging Ambassador Young, is that America does have political prisoners. The Carter administration is to be applauded for its campaign to highlight human rights violations around the world. But if Mr. Carter and the American people are to be credible, he cannot speak out about injustices in the Soviet Union while being silent about human rights violations in North Carolina.

It would seem that Mr. Carter would be equally vocal about the outrageous imprisonment of Rev. Ben Chavis and the Wilmington 10 which is cited by Amnesty International as a human rights violation in America.

It would also seem appropriate that while protesting the treatment accorded Scharansky and Ginzburg he would also protest the human rights violation of the Charlotte Three and the others in the 14 cases of American prisoners now adopted by Amnesty International.

The president and the rest of America should realize that Andrew Young's speaking out did not create the problems he addresses, and silencing him will not solve them.

Until America can give free speech to Andy Young, it cannot in good faith protest the suppression of free speech in other nations.●

CONGRESSMAN WOLFF ON SUNSET LAWS

HON. LESTER L. WOLFF

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call to the attention of my colleagues the testimony I offered to the Subcommittee on Rules and Organization of the House Committee on Rules regarding its consideration of "sunset" legislation and reauthorization measures to improve program review.

I believe the concept on which "sunset" laws are based is a vital one to the improvement of Congress budget authorization procedures. It is my hope, Mr. Speaker, that my testimony will help my colleagues in their consideration of this important issue:

TESTIMONY OF LESTER WOLFF

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and this committee for giving me the opportunity to offer my views on the need for sunset legislation to be considered and enacted by the House. I believe that a free exchange of views on the issue will prove helpful to the committee, the Congress, and the public at large.

It is quite fashionable today, Mr. Chairman, to say that the American people are in "revolt" against excessive taxes and government excess. In a sense, I think they are. But many have responded to this sentiment with simplistic, superficial proposals. When considering tax reform, we must be responsible, not simplistic. I would urge the House to consider tax reform in that spirit.

But today I want to express my sympathy for one manifestation of revolt: the public outcry against waste and inefficiency in government.

Simply stated, I believe the people of American want "big government" off their backs and bad government out of their pockets.

Inefficient government. Wasteful bureaucracies. Excessive regulation. These are elements that make up a large part of many an American's perception of his institutions and elected officials. This is a fact to which Congress must face head on. Waste must be trimmed, outmoded programs reevaluated, the bureaucracy whittled down to its necessary elements. We must distinguish between the essential and the excessive.

There is spending reform legislation which answers the cry of the taxpayer effectively and justly. I refer to H.R. 1756, H.R. 9533, and H.R. 10421, those bills which embody the concept commonly known as "sunset". I should like to say here that I also endorse the budgetary procedure known as zero-base budgeting, a similar method of fiscal frugality.

The concept of "sunset" laws offers Congress and the President the opportunity to fulfill their pledge to tame the wild bureaucracy.

The major provisions of "sunset" legislation which I support are:

The implementation of a fixed period for review and reauthorization of all Federal programs under the jurisdiction of the sunset laws. This would prohibit the authorization of new budget authority for more than this fixed period.

It would also prohibit authorization for a subject program for which a sunset review has not been conducted within this fixed period.

The requirement that all covered programs file a statement of objectives and a list of the costs and accomplishments of each programs to Congress;

The requirement that committee reports identify the effectiveness of authorized programs, potentially duplicitive programs, and previous efforts to accomplish the objectives of the program;

The requirement that the President's budget indicate the justification of any program subject to sunset review in light of previous examination of that program under sunset law.

The objective here is to institutionalize reevaluation. I should say that I see "sunset" as a concept designed, through its powerful threat of termination, to make programs more responsive to the desires of the authorizing committees, and thus the people. I do not see the goal of sunset to be the termination of agencies just for the purpose of termination. The simultaneous objective of tax dollars saved and taxpayers served can be best achieved by holding these agencies and programs accountable for the tight, efficient, and responsive administration of their authorized duties.

Congressional oversight has a history of support in the Congress. Unfortunately, it is an undistinguished history, full of rhetoric and intent but devoid of effective action. True, attempts at oversight have been made. Begining with the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, which directed authorizing committees to "exercise continuous watchfulness" over the programs under their auspices, there has existed the recognition that ongoing performance evaluation plays an important role in assuring effective and efficient tax dollar utilization.

In 1970, the Comptroller General and the General Accounting Office were ordered to investigate the effectiveness of Federal programs. And in 1974, the oversight role of committee was strengthened with the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act.

Yet, despite these measures, ongoing performance evaluation has not been a characteristic element of Congress' budget authority. Unfortunately, the practices of incremental budgeting and interminable authorization without regard to cost-effectiveness have continued. It is time for performance to live up to promise.

One innovative method of Congressional oversight is offered by the concept of "sunset." Already, twenty-five states now have such legislation on their books.

In 1976, Colorado introduced the nation's first sunset law. There, "sunset" has been aimed at regulatory agencies, and the first review, of 13 of the state's 43 agencies, took place in 1977. Of those thirteen, three were terminated: the Board of Professional Sanitarians, the Board of Shorthand Reporters, and the State Athletic Commission. The State Boards of Barber Examiners and Cosmotologists were consolidated, and four other agencies were reestablished with modifications designed to improve their accountability and responsiveness to the public interest while reducing the ties between the regulators and the regulated.

Other states have reported similar success with their "sunset" implementation efforts. State "sunset" programs have proven that the concept, when properly implemented, can effectively spot bureaucratic waste and take positive measures to curb it.

"Sunset's" primary corrective power lies in its "action-forcing device, the threat of termination. It requires positive action to renew a program, placing the burden of justification on the programs themselves. If this does not keep agencies on their toes and responsive to the dictates of the committees, then nothing will.

I believe that it is now time for the Congress to explore the "sunset" concept. A recent Harris poll reported that 72 per cent of Americans "no longer feel they get good value from their tax dollars." The blame for the prevalence of this atitude rests primarily with those that allocate these dollars, Congress and the Executive branch. Federal programs have been allowed to stagnate and become institutionalized, acting under open-ended authorizations and antiquated statutes. Simple common sense dictates that certain agencies will need periodic reform as the nature of the functions they are responsible for change and progress. "Sunset" will give us, and it will give the American people, an opportunity to continually oversee the performance of the institutions to which we entrust our welfare. "Sunset" offers our government a real possibility of reaching a new dawn for governmental effectiveness and efficiency.●

TRIBUTE TO BILL DONNELLY, MINORITY BUSINESS ENTERPRISE COORDINATOR

HON. HAROLD T. JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, minority business enterprise programs are serving a very important role in Federal-private business relations in recent years. One of the very successful programs is conducted by the Bureau of Mines in the Department of the Interior. It has been my privilege through the years to know Bill Donnelly, the present coordinator of the Bureau's minority enterprise program. Bill is a very capable individual and has distinguished himself in this position in the relatively short time he has served in this position.

Bill has worked for the Federal Government since the days of the Kennedy administration. Throughout his career in Government, he has always been a loyal and dedicated public servant. He has done this while at the same time overcoming serious and crippling injuries suffered in World War II.

It is my pleasure to recognize the important efforts of Bill Donnelly as a minority business enterprise coordinator. To outline his accomplishments, I ask that the July 17, 1978, letter written by Charlotte Spann, Chief of the Department of the Interior's Branch of Minority Procurement, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
July 17, 1978.

CHUCK DOZOIS,
Bureau of Mines, Columbia Plaza, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHUCK: On Wednesday, May 19, 1978, I had the pleasure of discussing the Department of the Interior Minority Business Enterprise (MBE) Program with your Bureau Director, Dr. Morgan and the Program Assistant Directors. The exchange of information and ideas was most beneficial to me and, I hope, of some value to the Bureau of Mines managers.

My first meeting, in fact, my first contact with Bill Donnelly occurred on that same day. At that time, I expect that many of the "how-to's" of the MBE program were as unfamiliar to Bill, the Bureau's Minority Business Enterprise Coordinator (MBEC), as they were to the program managers. However, Bill has been a very fast and a very enthusiastic learner. The purpose of this letter is to express to you and other appropriate Bureau officials my appreciation for appointing a person such as Bill Donnelly to the MBEC position.

As you have probably noted in the draft regulations, the MBEC function is essentially a three-way liaison among the procurement personnel, program technical personnel, and the minority vendor community. The purpose of that liaison, of course, is to ensure maximum awareness understanding, and participation in the MBE program by all three elements.

During the past forty-five days, I have noted that Bill Donnelly has not only understood the MBEC functions, but has carried out many of those duties in an exemplary manner. I have received very positive comments from Bureau of Mines personnel and from minority business representatives regarding Bill's aggressive and effective pursuit of increased minority business contract awards. My staff and I are delighted to be able to refer vendors to an MBEC who is knowledgeable about Bureau programs, as well as sincerely interested in the MBE program.

I appreciate the cooperation and support that you have given Bill by ensuring that he has the information and training needed to continue his performance in an outstanding and effective manner.

Please contact me whenever I can be of any assistance to you in your MBE efforts.

Sincerely,

CHARLOTTE SPANN,
Chief, Branch of Minority Procurement.●

CIVIL SERVICE CHAOS IN THE NAME OF REFORM

HON. HERBERT E. HARRIS II

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 11280, the civil service "reform" bill, has been reported from the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee on which I serve.

H.R. 11280 is a comprehensive bill with a noble objective, to "reform" the civil service system. It presented to the committee and to me a serious challenge which I was prepared to meet when the bill was submitted on March 3, 1978.

Yet I was compelled to vote against the bill, because I believe it is fatally flawed: It will open the door to politicization.

Cleaning up and streamlining the operations of the Federal Government is a worthy goal, an effort I support fully. Citizens should not have to wade through layers of bureaucracy to get their questions answered, to track down their social security check, or understand our tax laws. Government should be understandable; Government should be accessible. Government should not be a bureaucratic monolith impossible to cope with. Government should be responsive with decisions based on justice, not political intrigue or pressure.

Pursuant to the goal of developing a sound bill, I participated in 15 hearings, 12 in the Congress and 3 in agency headquarters here in Washington, and 10 days of markup. Additionally, I personally held three "town meetings" in my district to hear the views and suggestions of the citizens of the Washington area, Federal employees and non-Federal employees, individuals probably most familiar with the operations of the Federal Government.

The most persistent thread in the comments we heard from rank-and-file workers was that various provisions of this bill were a threat to the morale and structure of a nonpartisan, professional civil service system.

On February 27, 1978, I introduced H.R. 11165 which contains several strong provisions that would make innovation possible, but insulate the Federal Government against a spoils system. During the committee markup, after discussing these provisions with Civil Service Commission officials and other witnesses during the hearings, I attempted to get the safeguards embodied in my bill into H.R. 11280. Most were rejected.

I am dismayed that this committee has apparently articulated the thesis that politicizing the system is essential, in fact, is the centerpiece of a responsive and revitalized government. In fact, it was said of my amendments to prevent politicization that some would be a "bodyblow" to the bill.

I am afraid that in the name of "civil service reform" the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee has developed "civil service chaos." While the bill has some sound provisions, many elements which would have made it a true landmark for good government are lacking. My primary fear is that this bill will begin a slow unraveling of our merit system, a system that insures the impartial administration of our laws. This conclusion is inescapable: This bill opens the door for the politicization of the civil service system.

AN OPEN DOOR FOR POLITICAL MANIPULATION—SENIOR EXECUTIVE SERVICE

The committee's adoption of an amendment to implement the Senior Executive Service in three agencies over a 2-year period is an appropriate go-slow approach. However, the Senior Executive Service, while meritorious in purpose in many ways, will allow too many career jobs to become political, because of a fundamental flaw in the way appointments can be made. Currently, there are important safeguards and procedures that keep the designation of career and political positions at the high levels of Government quite distinct. Congress decides which jobs will be filled by political appointees at executive levels. For those GS–16, 17, and 18 pay grade levels, the President can designate which jobs should be political according to clear standards.

I offered a substitute to title IV, the Senior Executive Service, which would have made the SES a career service only. My substitute failed. If the President wished to designate certain jobs at these levels to be filled by political appointees, the duties of the job would have had to meet certain standards prescribed in law, such as engaging in the advocacy of administration programs or serving as a confidential assistant to a political appointee.

Under this bill, although there is a numerical limit on the number of jobs that can be filled by political appointees, this limit has no relationship to the responsibilities of the job. Thus, the head of a division handling grants, contracts, or tax returns can be a political appointee. By adopting my substitute, Congress would have been exercising clear controls over which positions are filled by career individuals and which by political appointees. And it would have provided that the type of appointment—career or political—would be determined by the responsibilities of the job, not an arbitrary agency- or Government-wide "magic" number.

EXCEPTING POSITIONS FROM THE CAREER SERVICE

Similarly, my amendment to provide clear criteria for excepting positions from the career service for all general schedule jobs would have insured against manipulation of jobs. Under the current law, which this bill does not change, the President can put a "competitive service" position in the "excepted service" (individuals not hired by competitive examinations and appointment) by only determining that "conditions of good administration warrant" this action. There are standards in regulations which can be changed any time. But my amendment would have firmly fixed strong standards in law.

We have heard too many stories of a "buddy system" and end runs around the merit system, stories of jobs being "moved" from a competitive hiring designation to excepted to accommodate a favored candidate. There is room and there is a need for noncompetitve positions in the executive branch. But there should be strong controls. My amendment, which was defeated, would have provided these controls.

POLITICAL INFLUENCES IN PERSONAL ACTIONS

The section of the bill on merit employment would have been strengthened has the committee adopted my amendment to clearly bar unwarranted political recommendations in hiring, promotions, and other personnel actions. Under my amendment, political recommendations from Members of Congress, their staff, White House officials, and political appointees in the executive branch would have been clearly prohibited. The notion that elected and other political officials ought to "determine who gets what jobs" in the career merit system is simply wrong. Some argue that it is a "fact of life." If so, it is wrong. It is time to stop winking at it. If we are going to have true civil service reform, then we must get politics out—once and for all. It has not been that long since the very foundations of our Government were almost pulled out from under us by inside political manipulation. My amendment would have greatly improved this bill.

The bill allows the new Office of Personnel Management to delegate to agencies various personnel functions, such as examining, hiring, and promotions. While allowing agencies to perform personnel functions previously centralized in the Civil Service Commission may speed up these procedures. I am concerned that here again the floodgate may be opened from improper political influences. This is why I offered an amendment to require that every chief personnel official be a career employee. I cannot see any reason why a personnel official, clearly performing an administrative function, should be a political appointee. This was another effort to keep politics out of the merit system; yet the committee rejected this provision.

AN IMPARTIAL MERIT SYSTEM PROTECTION BOARD

The bill establishes a new Merit System Protection Board to handle alleged violations of civil service rules and regulations. I believe the composition of this board would have been strengthened by the requirement that one member be from the career ranks of the Federal Government as I proposed. As it stands, these three political appointees, can be the former board chairman of a corporation or the former head of a campaign. While the bill rightly insures a political mix, I believe that a career employee could have provided an important career employee perspective in the board's proceedings.

Similarly, the selection of the chairman of the board is faulty since the bill provides that "the President shall from time to time designate one of the board members as the chairman of the Merit System Protection Board." My amendment, which was defeated, would have required the board members to elect a chairman every 2 years. Under the bill, the President can choose one chairman, and the next month choose another. This, I believe, is a loophole that can lead to political shuffling and reshuffling.

CLEAR RESPONSIBILITY AT THE TOP FOR THE MERIT SYSTEM

Under the bill submitted by the administration, the delegation of personnel administration caused me great concern. The bill allowed the President to delegate responsibilities to the director of the Office of Personnel Management who in turn could delegate to agencies. The General Accounting Office could investigate violations of the merit system if requested by Congress. The special counsel could investigate complaints and the board could hear them. But the bill was very fuzzy as to who, in fact, was responsible—where did the buck stop?

I offered several amendments which were accepted that make it clear that the director of the Office of Personnel Management is the individual responsible for compliance with civil service laws and procedures. Thus, for example, if an agency adopts a hiring procedure that gives favoritism to certain applicants, OPM cannot "get off the hook" by saying the agency was in charge. OPM cannot turn a blind eye. OPM is responsible for seeing that merit system principles are enforced and that corrective action is taken when violations occur.

EMPLOYEE RIGHTS AS PRIVATE CITIZENS

I continue to believe that employees should be able to engage in voluntary political activities as private citizens, and I helped draft H.R. 10, which would revise the current Hatch Act prohibitions on those rights. However, I do believe it is wrong to tie those revisions to a legislative vehicle that opens the door to politics within the system. The Hatch Act has never protected employees from on-the-job political pressures; a strong, impartial merit system provides that protection. But this bill severely weakens many of those protections.

OPEN AVENUE OF COMMUNICATION FOR OPM AND THE BOARD

I am pleased that the committee adopted my amendments to allow both the OPM and the Merit Protection Board to express their views directly to Congress without clearance by another agency. The Post Office and Civil Service Committee has too often been frustrated by the Office of Management and Budget's stranglehold on agency statements to Congress. Under my amendment OMB can make its views known; there is no barrier. But these agencies can express their views on policies, answer questions directly, and present testimony to congressional committees without first getting their views cleared and laundered by OMB. This is a most important Government reform.

EMPLOYEE PAY: A MIXED PICTURE

The committee adopted my recommendation that supervisory employees in GS–13 to 15 grades continue to receive annual comparability adjustments. Keeping Federal pay rates competitive with those of private industry is a sound principle, established by the 1970 Federal Pay Comparability Act. Had we deprived employees in these grades of an nual comparability, I believe we would have violated the basic principle of our Federal pay system.

However, the committee did not accept my amendment that would have guaranteed true comparability. My amendment would have removed the loophole in the current law that has allowed Presidents of both parties to deviate from true comparability six times since 1970. We understand the President will follow this unfortunate precedent again this year. The concept of comparability is negated if inherent in the law is an escape hatch allowing the President to thwart it.

The new merit pay system, to reward GS-13, 14, and 15 supervisory employees for performance on the job, is a worthy concept. However, it would be a new system and I believe Congress needs to know in the future whether it is actually working, whether it is in fact improving performance. Thus, I am pleased that the committee accepted my amendment to require the Office of Personnel Management to report in 3 years on whether it is working and how. My amendment requires OPM to show us in quantitative terms if it is achieving the purposes set out in this legislation. It is my hope, for example, that we can determine that because of merit pay incentives, social security claims processing has been speeded up or decisionmaking on grants has been expedited and that such improvements are saving taxpayer dollars. My amendment also requires OPM to recommend changes in the law to improve the new pay system. Instead of letting a program grind on interminably without close scrutiny, this amendment will provide a proper mechanism for a review in 3 years.

CONTROLLING GOVERNMENT GROWTH

I am pleased that the committee has essentially incorporated my bill, H.R. 8332, which begins a process of curbing the growth of top, political appointive positions. There has virtually been no control in the growth of executive level positions in the Federal Government, since Congress has created them sporadically without any sense of overall planning or consistency. In fact, the Civil Service Commission is unsure of the exact number of executive level positions.

Creating a new Assistant Secretary position at executive level III or a Deputy at executive level IV may be justifiable. Yet we have the questionable situation of the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration at level II ($57,500) and the Administrator of the General Services Administration at level III ($52,500).

Under my bill and the provisions added to H.R. 11280, the number of positions becomes fixed and the President is required to send to Congress a plan in 2 years for bringing some order and coherence to what is presently a hodgepodge.

Similarly, the committee has incorporated certain provisions of H.R. 5054 which will bring some sense to the "supergrade sprawl." This bill reaffirms the concept of a central supergrade pool and repeals the many "extraneous" authorities outside the pool that have been enacted.

Both of these sections represent an attempt to have a government that is controlled, orderly, and rational.

I am concerned and will continue to oppose an amendment adopted on a voice vote to require the Office of Personnel Management to conduct a study of the location of Federal agencies and a review of the possibility of relocating agencies out of the Washington, D.C., area. First, this is an inappropriate mission for the OPM. Second, the amendment does not provide clear direction for the study by specifying the criteria that should be considered, for example, the effect on employment or unemployment, the need for access to the President and Congress, cost to the taxpayer, environmental considerations, or delivery of services. Third, there is no apparent purpose or demonstrated need for the study. Another useless study will not improve Government efficiency.

Despite these meritorious changes, the bill adds up to a minus—not a plus—for the Federal employee and the American taxpayer. This bill is an unfortunate chapter in the history of an impartial, nonpolitical Federal Government. It may shake the very foundations of our merit system. It suggests that political affiliation is more important than competence. By creating cracks for political influences to seep into the system, it makes the argument more valid that Federal employees should be denied rights of citizenship in order to protect them. Should H.R. 11280 be enacted into law, protections for the employee will be greatly diminished and the merit system will be placed in great jeopardy.●

THE ANIMAL SAVING ASSOCIATION

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the pleasure of meeting with several young constituents who are members of the Animal Saving Association which is dedicated to the preservation of wildlife.

The president of the Animal Saving Association, Liza DiPrima of Madison, Wis., presented me with a copy of the organization's philosophy and wildlife protection program. Since a number of the Animal Saving Association's interests are pending before the Congress, and are deserving of our support, I would like to share their concerns as expressed by Liza with my colleagues.

MONDAY, JULY 24, 1978.

We are speaking for the children of the world who are concerned about the welfare of animals and do no want to see them brutally murdered. We are also speaking for the animals, who have no voices of their own

For thousands of years people have been using animals for their own enjoyment. When it pleases a man to go hunting, or just as long as a man can make money off of an animal's skin, he'll do it, without giving the animal a second thought. The truth is, animals do have feelings, and should be taken into consideration.

This world was not created for human beings alone, and animals have as much right to be on it as we do. Because we have aggressive tendencies, and because we have separated ourselves from the rest of the world and developed our own little communities known as cities and suburbs, we have classified animals as beneath ourselves and as being "renewable resources" and as not being able to feel pain. Man is not so godlike and almighty that he is in a situation to judge animals. Animals are not any "lesser beings," than we are.

In fact, they are the same in a number of ways. They think, they move around, they eat, they sleep, they breathe, they feel pain, and they talk in a language we can't understand. And if people feel that they are in such a position that they can judge animals and use them so, then I think we are the lesser beings.

Terrible things are happening to animals now. There are many good men and women in the Government and things are being done to change what's happening to animals. But the things that are being done are few and far between and millions of animals are still suffering or being murdered for no good reason. And if animals keep being killed at this rate by the time our generation gets to the Government there will be nothing left to save.

We would like to see the cruel things that are happening to animals stopped. There are programs for energy and defense and poverty, and now we feel it's time there was a program for the animals. Here are our suggestions.

(1). Immediately passing the Alaskan conservation bill that would turn about ¼ of Alaska into national parks, forests, and refuges.

(2). Stopping hunting and trapping on all the national parks, forests, and wildlife refuges.

(3). Stopping all the poisoning of wolves, coyotes, and other predators on national land and keeping it stopped.

(4). Making a law to make the wolf our national mammal so that these beautiful intelligent creatures don't have to die out.

(5). Stopping federal grants for people to conduct unnecessarily cruel and unusual experiments on animals in laboratories in the name of science.

(6). Having the Endangered Species Act protect all animals, even where a multimillion dollar dam is concerned.

(7). Enforcing the Marine Mammal Protection Act which says that no dolphins can be killed in tuna nets while catching tuna.

(8). Putting pressure on the Japanese and Soviet governments to stop killing the whales which are one of the most intelligent and one of the highest forms of life on earth.

(9). Stopping our government from deciding to allow people to resume killing the California Grey Whale.

(10). Stopping the Eskimos from killing the Bowhead Whales, because no "culture" justifies killing a form of life at least as highly developed as our own.

(11). Stopping the importation of all ivory to help Kenya and other countries in a fight to save the last of the world's elephants.

(12). Putting more pressure on the government of Canada to force them to stop allowing the harp seal hunt to go on.

Here are our ideas for what we feel is a better kind of world. Us kids have been accused by our opponents as not knowing anything and therefore not being able to have an opinion. But the words I wrote here are my own, and the thoughts that helped put them on paper are also my own. And if the kids are going to inherit this world then I feel that we should have opinions about the things that are happening in our world. We feel these issues are among the most important in the world and we won't stop fighting until the things we have talked about here come to be.

LIZA DIPRIMA AGELL.

President, Animal Saving Association and the children in the world who care about the animals and who would like to see the horrible torture and brutal murder stopped.●

CAMBODIAN INTERVIEWS

HON. JOHN B. ANDERSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am placing in the RECORD two more interviews with Cambodian refugees conducted last month:

INTERVIEW WITH CAMBODIAN REFUGEE IN BURIRAM, THAILAND, CONDUCTED BY AMERICAN EMBASSY OFFICER IN JUNE 1978

ACCOUNT OF SOURCE A*

Source A, 41, from Battambang Province, worked in the Wildlife and Forestry Department of the former government. After April, 1975, he was ordered by the Khmer Rouge to move to another village to become a farmer. After building a bamboo hut in the forest and beginning to clear land in the jungle, he was moved to another village, where he stayed until he fled to Thailand. He worked in the rice fields in the rainy season and helped to dig dams and irrigation ditches during the dry season. He escaped to Thailand May 19, 1978. His account follows:

CONDITIONS OF LIFE IN DEMOCRATIC KAMPUCHEA

"During 1975, rice rations were adequate. Each person received two tins of rice (500 grams) per day. Starting in 1976, the 156 members of my collective ate together. In 1976–78, the people received only rice porridge in inadequate amounts. There was no fish or vegetables to eat. Banana leaves and morning glories were mixed in the porridge. Everyone in the village was sickly. Diarrhea, malaria, and beriberi were very common. There was no modern medicine. The Khmer Rouge made their own of roots and leaves. After eating the Khmer Rouge medicine, some people got better, but others died. The medicine was not very effective. In general, life was getting increasingly difficult."

SYSTEM OF ADMINISTRATION AND DISCIPLINE

"There were 10,301 people assigned to my collective. Six villages were administered by an Administrator (kha mar pibal) from Angka (the Organization or Communist Party). Each village was headed by a chief, also from Angka. Occasionally, I saw a few Khmer Rouge soldiers, but not many. The village chiefs, and the group chiefs under them, received their orders from the Administrator. The village chiefs, in turn, passed orders to group chiefs who told us, the people, each day what work was to be done.

"Regarding discipline, for minor errors, such as being late for work thirty minutes, you were warned and given an oral reprimand. You might be reprimanded one or two times. The third time you committed the error, you were executed. If you were a former Government of the Khmer Republic (GKR) soldier or official, you would not be warned; you were executed even for the first minor error. If you committed a serious mistake, such as talking favorably of the former Government or criticizing the new Government, you were executed immediately. For other serious mistakes, such as stealing a banana or other food, you would be executed immediately.

"Rules were given orally in the Political seminars held every tenth day. They were not too clear, however. The village chief would merely say, 'work hard. Do not do anything wrong,' without specifying what was 'wrong.'

"Sometimes the village chief or group chief would reprimand you: advise you privately of your mistake. Other times, you would be reprimanded in the political seminars.

"In each village there were spies for the Administrator, called (chhlop). The spies arrested persons guilty of mistakes and took them to the Administrator. Only the Administrator could order execution. If you commit an offense, there is no recourse. "You are not allowed to defend yourself. You are simply executed."

EXECUTIONS

"I saw in my village in 1976 the execution of a former GKR soldier. The soldier had said, 'Let the others work before me; I will work after.' The soldier was executed immediately before my eyes. The Khmer Rouge knew that the man was a soldier under the former regime. This was the only execution I saw personally, but I heard of many both in my village and in the adjoining villages. You don't dare ask about such a thing, since everyone is afraid he will be executed if he is curious. People are not familiar with what is going on.

"I heard often that former soldiers and officials of the old government were executed. Each year the same story would circulate, as the Khmer Rouge discovered more former soldiers and officials. I heard that they did not catch them all at first.

"I heard the same thing on May 15 this year. I had a friend who worked in the Administrator's office. My friend told me that my name was on the list to be executed. I fled to Thailand, arriving four days later."

HUMAN, CIVIL, AND POLITICAL RIGHTS

"We, the villagers, were not allowed to make any suggestions about anything such as decisions affecting our lives, hours of work, what to grow or what to eat. Because of fear, no one ever dared to make any suggestion about living or working conditions.

"There are no human rights at all in Cambodia . . . You cannot talk, listen to the radio, cannot communicate from one house to another, one village to another. You are not allowed to move from one village to another, or even from one house to another. I have not seen a radio since April, 1975."

INTERVIEW WITH CAMBODIAN REFUGEES IN BURIRAM, THAILAND, CONDUCTED BY AMERICAN EMBASSY OFFICER IN JUNE 1978

ACCOUNT OF SREP SARANG*

Srep Sarang, 30, came from Kouk Chrey village, Sasak Sdam, Siem Reap Province. He arrived alone in Thailand May 17, 1978. His account follows:

CONDITIONS OF LIVING IN DEMOCRATIC KAMPUCHEA

"During the harvest, we had little rice, but we usually had gruel. We got the equivalent of two U.S. Army canteens of gruel a day. Beginning in 1978, we got one day off after ten days of work. Before that we worked every day. During the day off, we were allowed to go and look for food. Sometimes we could find a frog or a crab. I look fat now, but after starving so long, you swell when you finally get some food.

"In Kouk Chrey there are 100 families, or about 400 people; most were women. In late 1975, there was a period of starvation. Lots of men died of hunger. Women seem to be able to survive better."

*(Refugee agreed to use of his name in a public document.)

EXECUTIONS

"In 1975, I was told by the Khmer Rouge to dig graves. I was told that the graves were for the educated people, the wives of soldiers and teachers. I also dug eight holes where eighteen former soldiers were buried. These graves were in Trapeang Khim. Later it was discovered that I had been a local militia chief. After that, I was no longer used by the Khmer Rouge to dig holes.

"In 1976–77 the guilty would be executed alone. After late 1977 and in 1978 the guilty and his family also were executed, even for a minor offense. For example, if you were executed for being late to work, your family would be executed too. This may have been because of the leader. In 1975, the head of the northern sector in Siem Reap, Sot, was not too strict. Sot was found to be a traitor and was replaced in late 1977 by Se, who was more strict. Se followed the policy of killing wives and children of former soldiers and teachers. Se said that wives were the vestiges of the old society and are still corrupt.

"I saw lots of executions because I drove bullock carts from Poul District to my village Koul Chrey. After the past harvest, lots of people, but mainly women, were killed in Pouk District. There were also seventeen families who were taken to Trei Nhor and killed. A fellow who used to work for the Khmer Rouge, but who has become disaffected, told me about this. Four of the families had men. The rest were widows with kids, even pregnant ones. They were taken to Trai Nhor so the villagers would not know what happened to them.

"In February, 1978 100 families in Samrong Yea, Siem Reap, rose up and killed 2 Khmer Rouge. When this was known, the Khmer Rouge sent thirty soldiers to Samrong Yea in Pouk District and the other surrounding villages in Pouk District to kill the villagers. The people fled, but the Khmer Rouge hunted them down and killed most of the 3,000–4,000 who lived in nine villages. The people only had knives but the Khmer Rouge had AK–47 rifles. The people rose up because they could not get enough to eat and had no freedom.

"I was taken to be killed by the Khmer Rouge in December, 1977. There was a serious food shortage and hunger right before the harvest. A father and his son killed a water buffalo for food for themselves and the other villagers. I did not kill the buffalo but asked for some meat. The Khmer Rouge found out and took the father, son and me to jail. There were fifteen others there waiting to be executed. After fifteen days in jail, seven Khmer Rouge took the eighteen of us to a place four kilometers away called Kanhchoan Svey. All eighteen of us were tied together. Three Khmer Rouge dug a hole for our corpses. While they were digging the hole, I united myself and fled. I was very skinny since we got only one bowl of gruel a day in the prison. I hid in the rice fields. Finally, I crawled to the hut of my father. He was a sugar palm worker and received an extra ration of rice because the work was so hard. I then made my way to a place near Tonle Say where relatives lived. Everyone wanted to help me since everyone hates the Khmer Rouge, but no one knew what to do. I hid out for many weeks and finally escaped to Thailand.

"Before I made it to Thailand, I ran into a neighbor who told me that my wife, Kum Ku, 19, son Sarong Sarun, 5, and sister-in-law Kum Mey, 11, had been killed by the Khmer Rouge."

"HUMAN, CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS

"There are no human rights in Cambodia. The central government policy is to have genuine communism in Cambodia. The Khmer Rouge keep telling the people, 'This is communism.' Religion is no longer allowed. There was a wat near our village. The Buddha images in it were all smashed, and the place was demolished. They took the reinforcing bars from the building to construct dams. You don't even have the right to keep your children. They are taken away from their parents at age six to work. What people want is the same life that they had before."●

TRIBUTE TO BENJAMIN FRIEND

HON. JOHN L. BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, last week saw the passing of Mr. Benjamin Friend, a distinguished San Franciscan. Known to his many friends as Benny, he was a leader in the Jewish community and a person beloved by all who came into contact with him.

I am sure all Members will join with me and my colleague PHILLIP BURTON in offering our sympathy to Benny Friend's family.

SAN FRANCISCO MERCHANT BENJAMIN FRIEND

Benjamin Friend, a leader of San Francisco's Jewish community and pioneer Market street merchant who helped found Howard's Clothing Co., died yesterday at the age of 84.

At the time of his death, the patriarch of the three-generation family business was still active as chairman of Howard's executive committee.

A native of Russia, Mr. Friend came to San Francisco from New York in 1913. At first, until he could find work at his trade as a capmaker, he sold newspapers on the city's Barbary Coast and later was a conductor for the Market street railway.

The first family business was the United Cap Works established in 1920 at Eddy and Fillmore streets.

The specialty of the tiny firm—made by his wife, Mollie—was the white cloth cap favored by the city's longshoremen. Through Mr. Friend's merchandising efforts, the company's caps became popular throughout Northern California.

With capital derived from the cap works, he and his son, Eugene L. Friend, started Howard's in 1937 at Fifth and Market streets as a store specializing in fashionable men's wear.

Over the years, from the zoot suits of the '40s to the disco outfits of the present, the store mirrored the fashion habits of the San Francisco male.

In 1968, due to BART construction at Fifth street, the clothing store moved to its present expanded quarters at 969 Market street.

"He was a man who was devoted to the interests of his customers, his family, the city and to the Jewish community in particular," a family friend said yesterday.

As a leader of the city's Jewish community, he served as president of Temple Beth Israel in 1963 and was active with the Jewish Welfare Federation.

He is survived by his wife Mollie, his son, Eugene, president of the city's Recreation and Park commission, two grandsons, Robert and Donald, and a great-granddaughter.●

NAACP BAKKE SYMPOSIUM

HON. JOHN L. BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Carlton Goodlett, president of the National Newspaper Publishers Association, gave the following address at the NAACP Bakke Symposium in Detroit.

I commend its contents to the Members of the House.

BAKKE: A FAILURE OF BLACK PROFESSIONALS AND THE U.S. SUPREME COURT

(By Carlton B. Goodlett, Ph.D., M.D.)

Black leaders throughout America have been called to the NAACP Bakke Symposium. However, this forum apparently is dominated by Black lawyers who seem more concerned with a microscopic search for the blessings which Blacks allegedly find in the U.S. Supreme Court Bakke decision.

These Black members of the bar do evil greater than their knowing, because either they do not know the truth or they refuse to speak the truth on the latest Supreme Court's refusal again in the 115th post-Lincoln Emancipation year to unequivocally declare that in the USA there is only one kind of citizen, one kind of equality, and that Blacks are equal, period, under the law.

The time has come when the majority of Black physicians, dentists and lawyers residing in Northern California should be publicly condemned for their failure to deal a death blow to Bakke in the early days of the Bakke litigation. On two occasions, California Black physicians and Black lawyers refused to expend $1,600 for a Friend of the Court brief during the six months of delay in which the retired California Superior Court judge delayed his decision in the Bakke vs. University of California Medical School, Davis, California. Only three of sixteen Black doctors, dentists or lawyers could be found who would contribute $100 to defend minority youth's right to professional training in the early days of the Bakke case. In a moment of spirited conversation, members of the Charles Houston Law Club refused to financially support a Friend of the Court brief prepared by two radical female white lawyers: one, former President of the National Lawyers Guild, and the other, Western Regional Director, National Lawyers Guild. At the insistence of Black lawyers, Chief Counsel, NAACP, Nathaniel Jones came to California and spent three hours in discussion of the Bakke case and the evil results which would occur should Bakke go unchallenged. The Chief NAACP Counsel promised to do his duty in filing an amicus brief supporting the U.C. Medical School against Bakke; yet those conferees never heard from or saw any activity on the part of the NAACP Chief Counsel.

However, after the 6 to 1 California Supreme Court decision declared that the University of California Medical School, Davis, California, was guilty of "reverse discrimination" and ordered the admission of Bakke to medical school, alarm spread throughout America.

A few hardy souls, led by Attorney Nathaniel Colley, NAACP National Board Member and Regional Counsel, and Verna Canson, Executive Secretary, Region 1, NAACP, demanded that the University Regents appeal the California Supreme Court decision to the U.S. Supreme Court. The NAACP General Counsel, the Director of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund and other former friends in the civil rights struggle adamantly opposed the Board of Regents' appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court; they argued that Bakke was the wrong case to be taken to the U.S. Supreme Court. After intensive struggle by Colley, Canson and several others, the U.C. Regents yielded and appealed the Bakke decision to the nation's highest tribunal.

THE STRUGGLE WITH THE CARTER ADMINISTRATION

Lo and behold, on the second weekend of September, 1977, the game plan of the Carter administration in the Bakke case became evident. President Carter and U.S. Attorney General Griffin Bell were low-keying the U.S. Department of Justice's participation, deferring to Solicitor-General McCree and Drew Days, Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, the preparation of the brief. The initial U.S. Department of Justice brief pointedly rejected the argument that race was a viable criteria in the assignment of admissions to the medical schools.

An awesome amount of national Black pressure was brought to bear upon McCree and Days which reached even to the White House, before Carter and Bell relented and ordered McCree and Days to rewrite the U.S. Justice Department brief.

This tale of professional California Blacks, through selfishness and parsimony in the first instance, refusing to contribute financially to the constitutional question of equal rights for Blacks, accompanied by the foot-dragging of the National League staffs of the NAACP and the reluctance of the Black U.S. Solicitor General and his assistant to lead the struggle for full Black citizenship rights, seems like a fairytale or a bad dream; but these facts stated above are true.

U.S. SUPREME COURT: THE BAKKE DECISION

Finally, the Supreme Court of the U.S. in its 5 to 4 decision straddled the issue, giving a semblance of victory to Bakke and his reactionary supporters on one hand, while throwing a bone to placate Blacks by a 5 to 4 decision deciding that race is a viable factor in the selection of students in medical schools.

THE BAKKE DECISION—BETRAYAL OF BLACKS BY THE U.S. SUPREME COURT:

The Bakke decision was wrong. The State Supreme Court was wrong in its absurd pronouncement that the 1964 Civil Rights statute upholds the right of whites to continue trampling on minorities. And the U.S. Supreme Court was likewise wrong in its equally absurd allowance that Allan Bakke was the victim of "reverse discrimination."

During Reconstruction, laws were passed to enable former slaves to reap some of the benefits that American society had to offer its citizens; but whites soon grew tired of the notion of sharing their wealth and privileges with black people. Fortunately for them, the courts became easy allies, upholding Jim Crow laws and validating concepts like "separate but equal," just as the current Supreme Court has validated "reverse discrimination." Even with the Warren Court's historic unanimous school desegregation decision in '54, great mischief was done by the phrase "with all deliberate speed." The stark truth of the matter is that in a racist society, all of its institutional forms—legislative, executive and judicial—are honed to serve the racism of that society. The hard reality is that the Supreme Court has never unequivocally ruled in any constitutional question involving the rights of black people an affirmative Yes, indicating that blacks are henceforth to be judged as equal. With this truth, the survival of blacks depends upon the hard reality of injustice, and not the myth of "justice."

Hopelessly divided decisions, such as the Bakke one, can never satisfy those in need of protection and help from the courts, because they do absolutely nothing to help vanquish the three-headed scourge that afflicts the very vitality of American society: racism, sexism and classism. It is to these evils that the "eight old men in black who think white" need to address their attention, not the question whether one white man might not like the way an affirmative action program works.

THE BAKKE CASE—A CONDEMNATION OF THE SYSTEM

The Bakke Case says that blacks are denying loyal, competent, educated white males their god-given right to be educated at public expense in the professions. However, many factors were mitigated against Bakke's entry into a medical school, the foremost being the unwritten law of his age. Actually, 40,000 aspirants applied and 26,000 were rejected across the nation. The U.S. Supreme Court was asked to determine how this coveted pie of only 13 or 14 thousand admitted applicants could legally be divided among the competing groups: Blacks, Chicanos, women, handicapped, too old, too young, or even, like Bakke, white Protestant male; but the court did not address the underlying question: not just "Who get in?" but "Why isn't there room for more?"

The inability of all the contestants in the Bakke case to understand the basic indictment against a socio-economic system will deter the coalescence and unity so necessary for structured social change in the nation. The many inequities which exist in housing, education, employment and health care result from the parsimony of the government as well as the rampages of the military-industrial complex upon the people for all the profits that the traffic can bear. Now, even the Black masses clearly perceive that racial minorities have a stake in the development of a political ideology of abundance. The victims of economic racism, whose families for generations have been denied gainful employment, are saying: "There must be something better than this, and we're ready for it!"

These victims of racism and poverty can never surmount, alone, these handicaps imposed by a system which denies enriched opportunities to its people, not only in the field of medicine but also in jobs, education, and adequate health and welfare, to serve the needs of every citizen. Even Cuba, with its many demanding problems, finds it possible to educate proportionately more of its citizens in the medical sciences and healing arts than the USA, the world's richest and most powerful nation.

Support for affirmative action must be coupled with the understanding that the DeFunises and the Bakkes as well as every other person excluded from law school or medical school because of the restricted number of admissions, or because the level of unemployment is kept artificially high, are part of a problem which is not just a racial one, but an old economic shell-game, in which ethnic and racial groups, Black workers and white workers as well as women are played off against each other. The progressive forces must understand this no-win game; strategies must be developed which unite, not divide, the masses with their common needs, who are ruthlessly exploited by multi-national corporations and profiteers extracting their profits from the nation's reservoir of human, physical and moral resources, and having only one god: profits!

SUGGESTED ACTION:

The education of the children of five million or more Californians in the professions is severely threatened. The affirmative action program at UC-Davis was a result of a ten-year struggle against racism and sexism in the university system, as regards student body composition, faculty appointments and administrative officers. Clearly, California's racial minorities have been denied "equal protection under the law," which is a violation of both the U.S. Federal and the State of California constitutions. The racial minorities cannot continue to climb the Bakke mountain. Therefore, we recommend that Black leaders in California, in cooperation with leadership organizations, should enter both Federal and State Courts with legal action against the State Controller, Ken Corey, restraining him from dispensing any public funds to the Universtiy of California system or the State University system because of the lack of a higher educational policy guaranteeing the graduate and professional education and training of the children of five million Californians, who are more numerous than the population of 27 or 28 of the sister states. This action in the State and Federal Courts would place upon the University of California Board of Regents and the State University system Board of Trustees a court mandated timetable for the redress of this unconstitutional condition, and the courts themselves might become the first agents to monitor the performance of higher education and professional authorities of the University of California and the State University System.

SUMMARY

We have come to Detroit to say to both White and Black America, in a clarion voice, that the leaders of 1.8 million Black Californians the second largest Black population in any of the fifty States, will assume leadership in defining the evil intent of Proposition 13, the true significance of the Bakke Decision, and the formulation of the correct procedure to be followed in the struggle to mitigate the evil circumstances and aftermath if these infamous acts, both political and judicial, of White Californians. We will not under any circumstances permit others to speak for us, about us, or consider California's racist behavior without us.

The Bakke Decision must be a milestone which signals the final awakening of the people. This NAACP Bakke Symposium can become a historic event, if we have the strength and understanding to define the true intent of White California and White America to continually use its political and judicial institutions to thwart the just demands and the determined drive of Black Americans to be accepted as first-class citizens and to announce to the world that Black America, led by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, will pay any price and make any sacrifice, to destroy institutional and individual racism in the USA. If the opponents of this justifiable demand want to take this serious problem out of the area of firm, objective discussion and into the arena of confrontation, let it be so. At long last, it has dawned upon Black America, via Kerner Report enlightenment, that our struggle is not one against abberrant sociological and moral behavior, but that Blacks live in a society suffering from the social pathology of racism. Blacks accept the tragic reality that conversation will be as successful in eradicating institutional and individual racism in America as a neurosurgeon is successful in combatting brain cancer with aspirins. Racism is a dangerous disease which is leading to the destruction of the nation and all of its peoples. Moreover, if conversation of the appeal to reason would have given Black Americans full citizenship, we would have achieved our goal eons ago.

There are far too many educated Blacks and professionals who think that the Black upper class can make it, alone, in racist White America. Reality belies this myth. Blacks have and belong to each other. For those Black professionals—medical and legal—who have betrayed the Black masses in the struggle against Bakke, we leave their acts of penance and redemption to the good judgment of this Bakke Symposium.●

QUESTIONNAIRE RESULTS

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, it is customary in my office, as in the offices of many Members, to periodically seek the opinions of my constituents through a legislative questionnaire.

Earlier this year, I mailed such a questionnaire to each household in the Fifth Congressional District of North Carolina. A total of about 7,400 responses were returned to my office, and now have been tabulated.

I am pleased to share this tabulation with my colleagues in order to add the expressed opinions of a great many North Carolinians to public opinion data which they already have accumulated.

The results of the questionnaire survey follow:

A. CONCERNING THE FEDERAL BUDGET

How should the Federal dollar be spent? The Federal budget is outlined below according to the budget categories currently in use. Please indicate whether you think Congress should allocate more, less, or the same amount for each category:

NEED FOR IMPROVED NUTRITION EDUCATION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post recently published a story which illustrates the great need for improved nutrition education in our public schools. The Congress has wisely moved to increase this effort through creation of a $26 million nutrition education last year.

As a member of the committee which acts on authorizing legislation for school and summer feeding programs, I have seen the extent to which such laudable programs have been captured by industry. Often, I have feared, the programs have more to do with the purchase of excess commodities than with assuring that our children get nutritious and healthy meals. This problem is exacerbated when the foods fed our schoolchildren are in the form of junk and garbage foods. Even though sometimes filled with vitamins and nutrients, these foods resemble regular products which are not fortified. Encouraging the consumption of heavily sweetened foods through the school programs therefore is contrary to one of the fundamental goals of the program, good nutrition.

During our hearings, we all recognized that nutrition education must be a major part of any program. The Post article indicates, however, how this field, too, has been largely captured by the food industry which cannot hope to offer the impartial and factual mode of presentation we would all hope for. The program which will be generated through the funding contained in the summer feeding bill will hopefully be far more independent, and therefore more along the lines envisioned when the program was created.

I would like to share the Post article with my colleagues.

WHAT DID YOU LEARN IN SCHOOL TODAY?

(By Marian Burros)

Angel food cake with ice cream. Balls of cream cheese softened with cream or fruit juice, rolled in chopped nuts and served with fruit.

Is it appropriate to recommend these to school children as low-calorie desserts?

The executive director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, a nutrition activist, was telling a congressional committee last week that he doesn't think so even though the National Dairy Council offers them as such. Dr. Michael Jacobson said he believes the reason they are included in one of the Dairy Council's many publications used in the schools is simply because they contain dairy products.

He was using the National Dairy Council as an example of his claim that much of the nutrition education offered in classrooms comes from biased sources. "Many school systems have basically turned over the job of nutrition education to the Dairy Council. Teachers take its workshops, use its materials and echo its messages." Jacobson said the "industry-subsidized" organization has "contributed to nutritional ignorance, nutritional misinformation, and nutrition-related diseases."

The council's emphasis on dairy products, Jacobson said, "has something to do with the fact the Dairy Council's multimillion-dollar project is funded in large part by the dairy industry."

The Dairy Council is a trade association whose products were generally assumed to be good for everyone. That is, until recently, when many health experts began to recommend a decrease in the consumption of fat. Despite their acknowledged nutritional value, many dairy products are high in fat. But Jacobson might have chosen from dozens of other sources with more obvious direct commercial interests to make his point.

Material from Kraft's consumer relations department tells students that additives put into food are "beneficial" and "essential", and specifically that: "Safe human tolerances can be established for some substances that have induced cancer in experimental animals which have been submitted to questionable tests."

Many additives are used in Kraft products.

A Sugar Association brochure used in home economics classes says: "The Association has not found concentrated opposition to sugar in responsible medical circles, but it has detected concern among many individual doctors and dentists unfamiliar with the facts. This, unfortunately, seems to influence the thinking and actions of national and local politicians."

Isolated examples of companies or trade associations pushing their products and their points of view to the nation's student population? Not at all. These are just a smattering from the material, most of it free for the asking, available to school teachers all over the country. Much of it can be seen every year at the annual convention of the American Home Economics Association attended by many home economics teachers.

This year's exhibit in New Orleans had 240 booths. All but a very few of them were distributing information from people who have something to sell—whether sewing machines, microwave ovens, carpet sweepers, baby products, soft drinks, sugar-coated cereals, jams, jellies, marmalades, fish and cheese.

Only four government agencies had displays: the Food and Drug Administration, the Department of Agriculture, the National Bureau of Standards and the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute.

According to Sheila Harty, who has made a study of corporate advertising in schools, most teachers are delighted to have this material and are not critical of it. The slick, highly professional films, bright workbooks and recipe guides with four-color illustrations and photos are not available from other sources.

One Florida high school teacher told Harty, an education media specialist for Ralph Nader's Center for the Study of Responsive Law: "Materials disseminated by private industry couldn't be perceived as anything else but a sales pitch. But who cares? The federal government couldn't do as well."

The material is divided into two categories: that which is specifically geared to teaching and that which is informational and used both in classrooms and as promotional material to fill requests from the public. Some of the advertising is fairly subtle: the company's name is mentioned only occasionally. But the majority are like a recipe booklet from Dr. Pepper.

"Cooking with Dr. Pepper" offers a history of soft drinks, information on kitchen technology, nutrition information on the soft drink and about 40 recipes, all of which use Dr. Pepper as an ingredient. There is one for corn bread (1 package of cornbread mix and Dr. Pepper), another for Sugar Free Gazpacho Salad for which sugar-free Dr. Pepper is recommended.

In Campbell Soup Company's "Nutrition" pamphlet, under the headings of the well-known four food groups, the company lists its products. The nutrition information tables contain only the items the company sells—from canned soups and beans to frozen TV dinners.

Betty Crocker offers a filmstrip extolling the virtues of convenience foods—its convenience foods. Each recipe suggestion calls for a General Mills product.

Sometimes a company is quite direct in counterattacking suggestions that its products might not be the most nutritious in the world. At the convention, Hershey's offered home ec teachers: the story of chocolate and cocoa, including how Hershey's came into being; 48 of Hershey's favorite recipes; answers to some questions about Hershey Foods Corp., and a 28 minute film, "The Great American Chocolate Factory." In addition the company's literature includes a statement to consumers.

In essence it says that the company "shall stand firmly in our position that Hershey's products are mixture of ingredients which inherently have nutritional value," despite charges to the contrary that they and other confectionery products are " 'empty calorie' or so called 'junk' foods."

The brochure includes excerpts from a speech made by the company's director of research. Questioning the FTC's proposal to regulate children's advertising, Dr. Barry Zoumas says: . . . is an apple consumed between meals more or less carcinogenic than a candy bar? Since apples contain a greater percentage of their calories from sugar than most candy bars, this is an important question to have answered before one bans the advertising of candy on television and attempts to encourage the consumption of apples."

The catalogue of educational publications and audio-visual aids from the National Livestock and Meat Board includes a pamphlet explaining "beef's role in feeding a hungry world": "With millions of lives at stake, decisions must be based on facts, not slogans. Anti-beef critics have seized on the world food situation to strengthen their arguments—often using misleading, unfactual statements. This folder sets the record straight. . . ."

The Cereal Institute has "facts and perspectives" to correct "confusing and mislead" impressions about the nutritional value of sugar-coated cereals.

Filmstrips on microwave cooking cover safety questions: "Myths concerning microwave ovens are scientifically dispelled."

The National Soft Drink Association puts in a pitch for education rather than "punitive or restrictive container laws," (bans on nonreturnable bottles and cans) to control litter.

Critics of this kind of nutrition education material are asking the government to provide the material instead. Some attempts are being made. The Department of Agriculture has just made $26 million available to the states to develop classroom materials, instruct teachers in nutrition principles and educate both students and school food-service workers about the relationship between diet and health.

The critics, for the most part nutrition activists inside and out of government, have a curious ally in their belief that business should not be in the business of educating the nation's children. What the president of the Association of National Advertisers, Peter Allport, has to say about the role of television advertising as a vehicle for educating children applies to education in the schools as well. In a letter to the editor of Advertising Age, Allport wrote:

". . . Education (as well as other things 'of the spirit') does not fall within society's mandate to business or, indeed, within its competence. Accordingly, I can think of few things which would be more inevitable than a rightful public outcry against an intrusion by business into areas such as education where it has neither competence nor a publicly legitimized role."●

THE RECLAMATION LAW CONTROVERSY: BEHIND THE SMOKE

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, in recent months a great debate has developed over the issue of the 1902 Reclamation Act. Some very expensive and slick advertising has been bought in national magazines and major newspapers which creates the impression that enforcement of the law will cause a catastrophic disruption of American agriculture. As I pointed out in my testimony before the Water and Power Subcommittee last week, enforcement of the law will affect only farmers in reclamation districts. Such farms constitute just two-tenths of 1 percent of all U.S. farms, and just 1 percent of all farmland. Moreover, the 1.3 million acres of reclamation land which is excess constitutes just a fraction of the total acreage, most of which is entirely in compliance with the law today.

Why then the major outburst? I would suggest that it has been generated not by a wide group of individuals, but by a select group of special interests who have been profiteering from lax enforcement of the law, and lavish taxpayer subsidies, for many years. While these special interests point to the jobs created and the taxes they have paid over the years, it is important to note the enormous personal profits—hundreds of millions of dollars—which they have enjoyed, all at the taxpayer expense, because it is the taxpayer and the utility ratepayer who pick up the tab for the subsidized water and the forgiven interest.

Let us look for a moment at just one of these districts. The Westlands Water District, which is part of the San Luis Unit in the Central Valley of California, is the largest, and probably one of the richest reclamation districts in the world. It is composed of 600,000 acres of land, converted by federally subsidized water into one of the most productive agricultural areas in the world. Without the Federal subsidy, it would have remained grazing land, for the most part. Every year, Westlands uses over 1 million acre feet of subsidized water, paying a rate established in the mid-1950's. The contract contains no inflation escalator clause, and runs until 2008. Every year water is delivered under that contract, taxpayers and utility ratepayers are making up the difference. This year, the subsidy totals $7 million.

Let me indicate the size of the subsidy enjoyed by this one reclamation district, noting in advance that it is not by any means representative of all districts. But neither are all other districts or landowners decrying enforcement of the law, or making the ludicrous demands upon the public treasury, which are a matter of habit to Westlands. I think it would be especially illuminating to compare the size of the subsidy to this one district, with its few hundred landowners, to the fiscal condition of New York City. Hopefully, the comparison will help my colleagues from nonreclamation States appreciate the magnitude of the benefits which have been bestowed for years on these special interests.

The Bureau of Reclamation has estimated that the subsidy to Westlands equals $1,600 per acre. Given Westlands' 600,000 acres, that totals $960,000,000 in subsidy. Although Westlands has a "population" of 9,000 people, few of these actually own land. There are actually only about 200 farm operations. But assume that all 9,000 profit from the subsidy. That means a per capita subsidy of $107,000.

Now, by comparison, New York City has 7,600,000 people. According to Westlands' formula, New York City deserves a subsidy of over $800 billion. And, I would point out, New York City also generates great wealth, and its residents pay a lot in taxes. Naturally, no one is suggesting that we began laying out enormous amounts of money for these kinds of subsidies to cities, or even to farmers in other regions of the country. Nor are all farmers in the West enjoying such benefits. But these figures should cause us to wonder a bit about all the furor which has exploded over the Reclamation Act, because the loudest cries are coming from a very select, and very prosperous farm elite. The rest of us should study the record carefully, and hang onto our wallets.●

AMERICAN PRODUCTIVITY

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, the lead editorial in this morning's Washington Post addresses a subject which, in my judgment, should be of great concern to all Americans. I refer to the alarming decline in the growth of productivity in this Nation in the past few years.

Productivity, the output per hour of the American worker, grew at amazing rates during the years following the Second World War, and the United States took a commanding lead in world markets. The growth in productivity allowed Americans to improve their standard of living across the board, and this improvement continued over a period of so many years that we have come to expect it. The difficulty lies in the fact that we are not making the gains in productivity that are a prerequisite to the further upgrading of our standard of living.

Improving our Nation's productivity will not be as simple as it has been in the past. It will require hard work, creative thinking, and positive attitudes. All levels of the work force must be willing to put in a full day's work for a full day's pay while at the same time developing ways in which jobs can be done better and more efficiently. The challenge can be met, with awareness and true commitment to the improvement of our own standard of living, and indirectly, that of the rest of the world.

I direct the attention of my colleagues to the article, reprinted here.

[From the Washington Post, July 31, 1978]

AMERICAN PRODUCTIVITY

Throughout most of the years since World War II, productivity in the American economy has risen briskly. As it went up, it carried with it people's earnings and standards of living. But the rise began to slacken about a decade ago, and for the past year and a half there has been hardly any rise at all. Of all the changes overtaking the American economy, the behavior of productivity is one of the most peculiar—and one of the most disquieting.

The immediate consequence of no productivity gains is that inflation will become harder than ever to control. But if the present pattern continues, it will also ignite uncomfortable political questions about dividing the pie in a country that has come to expect, and to count on, steady increases in both public and private wealth. Nobody really knows why productivity has stopped rising. All explanations are, to one degree or another, speculative. But the evidence suggests that it is no minor passing blip on the chart. The causes seem to lie deep in the changing structure of the national economy.

Productivity is simply the average output per hour of labor. The Labor Department computes it every three months, and it has just published the figures for the spring quarter of this year. They show that productivity was rising at the minuscule rate of 0.1 percent a year, after having fallen during the winter. Through the 1950s and most of the 1960s, it was going up at an impressive pace of nearly 3 percent a year. In the years after 1968, the trend dropped to half that rate. Since late 1976, it has been almost flat.

That departure is consistent with two other surprises. Inflation has been running considerably higher in recent months than most people expected, and unemployment has been considerably lower. Output over the past year has been raised by putting more people on payrolls, not by improving each person's capacity to produce.

It's a striking departure, and one explanation may well lie in the rather low rates at which business has been investing new capital. That, in turn, may be the result of low profits. Another possibility is the cost of the new environmental and safety rules, requiring industry to invest heavily in equipment to control air and water pollution.

Whatever the influences controlling productivity, they vary enormously from one country to another. In international competition, the United States is currently not doing well. The following brief table compares the increases in productivity in manufacturing, for the decade 1967–77, among some of the major industrial powers:

United States, 27 percent; France, 72; West Germany, 70; Italy, 62; Japan, 107; Canada, 43; Great Britain, 27.

There is a tendency in this country to regard Britain as the world's great example of industrial decline. But you will note that the rate of productivity gain in British factories over the past 10 years has been the same as in American factories.

Since no one is quite sure why the American rate has fallen, no one is in a position to offer a sure remedy. But these latest productivity figures may well strengthen the impulse in Congress to cut taxes on capital gains, in an effort to increase investment. Beyond that, it's also necessary to consider the possibility that some of this change may lie beyond the reach of government policy. A good many Americans' ideas about work, incomes and economic growth began to change around 1968. These new attitudes may now be showing up in the statistics on the nation's economic performance.●

NEVER TOO LATE

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, my district has become a symbol of what is gone wrong in urban America, and, fortunately, it has begun to become the laboratory in which we will discover some of the ways to make our urban policy work again. Unfortunately, the perception of my community—and it is a community—has been colored by all the bad news—the documentaries about arson, the photographs of rubble-strewn streets, the stories about crime and addiction. But I want to talk about another South Bronx, the South Bronx that has the capability of producing people who are lawyers, scientists, and ministers, and yes, Members of Congress like myself. That South Bronx exists, and one of my priorities here in the Congress is to get that image of my community across to Americans.

Recently, an article appeared in Nuestro, a new English-language magazine that covers the American Hispanic community. It was an article about the 12 outstanding Hispanic graduates of 1978, and among those graduates was Luis Maceira, a native and resident of the South Bronx, who, after receiving a degree as a premed psychology major this spring, will enter medical school this fall—at the age of 35. Luis wants to stay in the South Bronx to help. I applaud his determination, his vision, and his talents. It is people like Luis Maceira who will revitalize the South Bronx for future generations.

LUIS MACEIRA: NEVER TOO LATE

Looking back today, he remembers Morris High School in New York's South Bronx barrio as "not the best school around." So Luis R. Maceira dropped out at age 17 and joined the Air Force. For four years, he was a "grease monkey" fixing Air Force machinery in Viet Nam and elsewhere. Along the way he decided to finish his education and worked first for his high school general equivalency diploma, then for a degree at City College of New York. This month Maceira gets his diploma as a pre-med psychology major; next he goes to med school at State University of New York at Stony Brook. When he graduates, he will be a G.P.—35 years old. Luis is unfazed by his delayed start; he does not believe it is ever too late for change. The native of Santurce, Puerto Rico, has already forsaken bachelorhood for marriage and fatherhood. Nor do the well-publicized difficulties of med school daunt him. By now, Maceira knows that he can stick to his studies. His greater motivation is the people of the South Bronx. "People here always get the bad end of the stick. But as a doctor, I can help people directly. It may sound corny, but I got into this to help my people. I have lived in the South Bronx all my life. I want to practice here as a family doctor. I want to give something back to this place."●

SUPPORT FOR CETA

HON. WILLIAM S. MOORHEAD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my strong support for H.R. 12452, the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA). This bill provides job training and employment opportunities for the economically disadvantaged, the unemployed, and the underemployed. This bill also implicitly provides a measure of the heart and wisdom of America. It is not news to anyone that America has a chronic employment problem—millions of people who want to work cannot find jobs. The policymakers of the United States have two options—to try and actively do something about it or not. I would hope that only the most callous would not want to make the attempt. Failure to try means not only that we do not care about the welfare of our citizens but also means that the rolls of those on welfare will swell. It is in the enlightened self-interest of America to try—and try hard. When administered properly and run efficiently, CETA represents such an effort. The individual dignity innate in each and every human being demands that those who want to work can.

I have recently received telegrams from Richard S. Caliguiri, mayor of Pittsburgh, and from Allegheny County Commissioners Jim Flaherty, Thomas J. Foerster and Robert N. Peirce, in full support of the CETA bill. I strongly support their statements and urge others to consider their arguments.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully request unanimous consent to have these telegrams printed in the RECORD.

PITTSBURGH, PA.,
July 21, 1978.

Congressman WILLIAM MOORHEAD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

It is my understanding that the CETA reauthorization bill is scheduled to reach the House the week of July 24. The CETA program has been extremely successful in the City of Pittsburgh. Since its inception it has provided employment and training services for over 34,000 individuals. The unemployment rate in the city, according to the latest available figure, is 6.4 percent—the lowest it has been for several years. However, the unemployment rate for minorities and women is above the 6.4 percent mark and is estimated to be even higher for minority youth. Although the economy of the city has shown signs of improvement in the past few months, there remains thousands of economically disadvantaged individuals waiting to obtain training and/or a public service job in the city's public service and training applicant files. I believe that funding for such programs should be cut. In addition, I do not believe that the current CETA legislation concerning PSE wages and supplementation should be altered. If a person is to be placed in a public service job that person should receive a wage commensurate with the wages received by other employees doing the same job. More importantly, it seems terribly unfair that if a PSE participant has the same skills as a non-PSE employee that the CETA participant should only be paid the minimum wage. The intent of CETA is not merely to provide jobs but also to provide a decent standard of living for the economically disadvantaged. The City of Pittsburgh is about to enter into a new phase of economic growth. It is my hope that this growth is not suddenly hindered by a reduction in the CETA program which would add considerably to our jobless rate. I look forward to a CETA re-enactment which will enhance the success which the program has enjoyed.

RICHARD S. CALIGUIRI,
Mayor of Pittsburgh.

Hon. WILLIAM S. MOORHEAD,
House of Representatives, Rayburn Building,
Washington, D.C.

Allegheny County strongly opposes efforts currently underway to add amendments to CETA reenactment. H.R. 12452, as it is presently reported by the Education and Labor Committee, is already a reform bill with controls against fraud and abuse, strict eligibility requirements, limitations on length of time an individual may hold a P.S.E. job, wage limitation, etc. Please vote against all amendments concerning public service employment that would effect any of the following: 1. lower P.S.E. wage ceiling, 2. restrict P.S.E. to minimum wage, 3. eliminate age indexing by area or consumer price index 4. reduce the number of jobs authorized in title VI, 5 eliminate P.S.E. in title II, 6. eliminate title VI, 7. change the title II allocation formula or any other amendments that would impede the intent of the original legislation.

TRIBUTE TO GEORGE HUBERT BATES

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, with sadness, I bring to your attention the passing of a very special friend of mine, George Hubert Bates of Jefferson City, Mo., dedicated his life to serving people of our State. He held State offices for 28 years, being State treasurer from 1953 to 1957 and commissioner of finance from 1957 until he retired in 1961.

Mr. Bates was active throughout his life. He was chief clerk at the Lexington Selective Service Board in World War I. He served as president of the Lexington Chamber of Commerce and the Lexington Country Club. He belonged to the Lexington Elks Club, the Woodmen of the World, the Masons, and the Scottish Rite bodies. He was a member of the Lexington Methodist Episcopal Church and served as superintendent of its Sunday school.

He was a warm and good friend. We became acquainted when I was a boy, as he and my father were close friends.

Besides his accomplishments, Mr. Bates was a man you could turn to for advice. He lived a long and admirable life and I am honored to have known such a dedicated man.●

MEDICAL RESEARCH ON HUMAN SUBJECTS

HON. PAUL G. ROGERS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today legislation to establish the President's Commission for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine and Biomedical and Behavioral Research. The proposed Commission would succeed the present National Commission for the Protection of Human Subjects of Biomedical and Behavioral Research which goes out of existence on October 31, 1978.

The studies of the National Commission have been of great value to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and to Congress in developing policies which would take into account the ethnical aspects of research involving human subjects and guarantee that the rights of such individuals be fully protected. The Commission's reports concerning the conduct of research on prisoners and children, on psychosurgery, on informed consent, and a variety of other difficult topics dealing with human research subjects were produced by a very able and hard-working group of outstanding individuals, whose efforts deserve our highest praise.

While ethical problems connected with research on human subjects still are very much with us, our society is currently grappling with many very difficult ethical dilemmas in the practice of medicine and in the conduct of biomedical and behavioral research which go far beyond the protection of the rights of the research subject. It is time that we began to deal with these problems directly and as expertly as possible. Our experience with the National Commission has demonstrated that the concept of a working study commission is a valid one, and has provided a model which may now be applied to the study of these areas at a time when Congress and the administration is having to make crucial policy decisions.

A glance at virtually any newspaper or television news program in recent weeks would indicate that both medicine and science have reached such a high degree of sophistication that we must now give serious thought to the ethical aspects of techniques and procedures which were believed to be impossible only a few years ago. Last week, it was the achievement in England of the fertilization of a human egg cell outside the human body and its subsequent transportation into the womb of the egg's donor. As you know, this resulted in the birth of a normal baby. While I regard this as an achievement which will be of great benefit to many couples presently unable to have children, there are, nevertheless, both ethical and legal questions raised by the use of the technique, particularly if it proceeds past the experimental stage to routine practice.

In hearings held by the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment over the past few months, many other equally important issues were brought to the subcommittee's attention. For example, we have seen the development of X-ray technology to the point where it has become such a commonplace, routine diagnostic aid, that it's use is rarely questioned by either physicians or the public. Yet we were told in our hearings that the common practice of the routine X-ray screening of apparently healthy individuals is needlessly exposing the public to the risks of radiation and is adding substantially to the cost of health care while providing little or no benefit. This is but one of many examples where a technique led to a standard procedure with no prior or ongoing evaluation of whether the practice was efficacious or if it posed risks to the patient.

The once widely practiced tonsillectomy, the use of high oxygen levels for premature infants and the treatment of acne with X-rays all serve as past reminders of immediately applying a technique to routine practice before it was shown to provide a net benefit to the patient. More recently, we have had the swine flu issue. And, we are now trying to assess whether or not coronary bypass operations are really a good thing. Thus the current lack of a mechanism to establish standards of efficacy in procedures performed on humans poses a serious ethical problem.

Another perplexing area which the subcommittee looked into was the increasingly costly end stage renal dialysis program, which is projected to cost taxpayers upward of $1 billion per year in the near future. While prolonging the lives of kidney patients, a majority of those on dialysis are still very sick people and cannot lead normal lives. Dialysis cannot cure the disease. Yet only a very small fraction of this sum was spent on research to better understand the causes of kidney disease and to find a more satisfactory treatment. Is this the most effective way for us to allocate our resources for health care and for biomedical research? Is it the most ethical? Should we opt in favor of research which will provide the greatest long-term benefit, or is it more important to provide the greatest relief possible to those who are suffering now? Can a proper balance be found?

There are many other issues which must receive serious attention soon. Are the patients rights in clinical trials fully protected? Is it appropriate for American drug companies to conduct clinical trials outside the United States where standards for the protection of the subject are far less stringent than under FDA rules? We have in recent years based much of our health policy on the proposition that health care is a right, not a privilege. Yet the quality and availability of health care differs widely depending on one's income and where in the country one happens to live. Can we develop a sound program of national health insurance without first examining the ethical problems in distribution of health services? Should the maintenance of life, per se, at any cost, override all other considerations in making medical decisions? Does one have a right to die? If so, under what conditions? And what of informed consent in agreeing to a particular medical procedure? Do patients or next of kin, at a time of great anxiety, really carefully read the forms they are signing? Does "informed consent" mean that one gives up the right to legal remedies in the event that person is unnecessarily harmed by a procedure?

With a little reflection, I am sure we could all add many more topics to this list. However, as a beginning, I have included in the charges to the proposed Commission the following eight subject areas. Additional mandates may be added by the President:

First. The allocation of Federal resources for biomedical and behavioral research and for health care delivery;

Second. The requirements for informed consent to participation in research projects and to otherwise undergo medical procedures;

Third. The establishment of a uniform definition of death;

Fourth. Counseling and testing for genetic diseases;

Fifth. The differences in the availability of health services as determined by the income or residence of the persons receiving the services;

Sixth. The requirements and guidelines applicable to clinical trials;

Seventh. The establishment of standards of efficacy applicable to medical procedures performed on humans; and Eighth. Human in vitro fertilization.

I call upon my colleagues to support the proposed legislation and work for its speedy passage.●

THE HUMAN VALUE OF THE HOSPICE PROGRAM

HON. JOHN L. BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure to attend a meeting of Marin County Hospice members where I was informed about the tremendous job being done in treating the terminally ill.

I would like to share the remarks of Jim White, a hospice survivor, that clearly indicates the human value of the hospice program.

WHAT HOSPICE MEANT TO US

(Remarks by James D. White, retired Associated Press correspondent and editor, to a luncheon at Hospice of Marin in San Rafael, Calif., for Rep. John Burton, his staff and other guests, July 7, 1978.)

When Jenifer, my wife for 44 years, died of bone cancer last October, she had been under Hospice care for about six months. She was 65, I was nearly 70, and we had no children or other family members nearby. Help from Hospice therefore had special meaning for us, and at the receiving end we concluded—in many discussions that continued as long as she lived—that we could discern three outstanding qualities in what the Hospice people did and how they went about it.

The first was Hospice's candor and conscience in filling the cancer information gap. We knew no more than anyone else about cancer: this despite Jenifer's 10 years as a surgical secretary during which she got no closer to cancer than operative notes—and we all know that in most cases an operation is only the opening skirmish with cancer; and as for my 40 years as a newsman, well, among the scores of stories I have written or edited dealing with cancer I can think of none that contained any substantive information about what actually happens with cancer. As for doctors, we had found them usually—and understandably—reluctant to go into detail about the progression of cancer.

Where it could, Hospice answered our questions, with tact and patience. Where it didn't have the answers, it went after them and reported back. Hospice people told us what equipment we'd need, what skilled and unskilled help was available, and where to get all these. In other words, they told us what to expect, what could be done about it, and how to do it.

The second factor that we found extremely valuable was Hospice's accessibility. We felt that the importance of the 24-hour call-in service cannot be overestimated. Yes, our doctor had told us to call him at any hour, day or night, and he meant it. But general practitioners tend to overwork themselves—ours certainly did—and are distracted by other patients and other kinds of patients, and one hesitates to add to their burden. It therefore was invaluable to us to be able to call Hospice at any hour in the 24-hour clock and get a sympathetic and helpful answer from specialists in our kind of case.

The third element that we thought was extremely important was Hospice's insistence upon fitting the care to the patient, instead of stuffing the patient into the relentless routine of some institution designed for other purposes. We were deeply impressed by the care and the tact with which this approach was carried out. Typically, Hospice asked us early in the game if we had any particular religious or philosophical beliefs. No, we said, we're agnostics, holding nothing more complicated than the simple Taoist concept of the cosmos as a balance, and that within that balance there are no effects without causes. The question never came up again, and we appreciated very deeply the wisdom of Hospice's universalist approach and its willingness to work within any reasonable framework of beliefs.

Jenifer first heard of Hospice from a nurse on the midnight-to-dawn shift at Marin General Hospital where she was undergoing radiation therapy in April, 1977. At our request, Hospice entered her case, and when radiation was finished it was Hospice's help and guidance that enabled us to be at home together for a whole month. In addition to the advice, information and special equipment provided by Hospice nurses such as a sheepkin and an eggcrate mattress, I should mention the lessons given me by the home health aide in bathing, bedmaking and other details which enabled me to take care of Jenifer.

During that month she was able to go through the whole house with me, in her wheelchair, deciding all the things that had to be decided after 44 years of life together. This made it possible for an innately tidy person to feel that her affairs were in some sort of order, and it made it possible for me to know what her wishes were and to carry them out later without having to guess about them.

When she no longer could sit up, Hospice and our doctor helped us arrange for a private room in a rest home where I could be with her 24 hours a day. There, we had three months together.

As she grew progressively weaker and more helpless, I was able to help her more, with her feeding, her medication, her bathing, massage and taking care of her colostomy. In this environment of quiet and privacy, she became much freer of pain, more cheerful and alert, and was fully aware of everything, including her own condition.

To Jenifer, Hospice meant that it was possible for her to end her life with the same sense of self-possession with which she had lived her 65 years. Together, we faced the end in peace and dignity which would have been impossible without Hospice.

For me, it meant that Hospice had helped her to suffer much less, and had made it possible for me to feel that I had been able to do as much for her as anyone could.

Because Hospice really works, I can stand here and talk to you about what it did and still does. I mean, now, the bereavement program, in which it is wonderfully helpful to be able to meet and talk again with those wonderful people who helped us both, who know what happened to us both. I have received much help from others who are ahead of me in the survivor experience, who understand without being told what the problems are. And I find it deeply satisfying to be able to understand and, at times, help those who are just entering the survivor sequence and are struggling up through the overwhelming sense of loss and disorientation I know something about.

Finally, I find what volunteer work I've done for Hospice immensely therapeutic, providing a sense of being part of something that is as uniquely useful as it is desperately needed.●

PROBLEMS WITH 5.5 PERCENT CAP ON FEDERAL PAY RAISE

HON. GLADYS NOON SPELLMAN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mrs. SPELLMAN. Mr. Speaker, sections 860 and 861 of H.R. 13635, the defense appropriations bill for fiscal year 1979, as reported by the House Appropriations Committee, would place a 5.5-percent ceiling on all Federal blue collar employee pay raises which take effect during fiscal year 1979 (October 1, 1978 to September 30, 1979). I can appreciate the House Appropriations Committee following the President's recommendation that Federal white collar pay raises be kept at the 5.5-percent level. However, there are some problems with this appropriations "cap" which I wanted to bring to my colleagues' attention.

Because Federal blue collar raises are not implemented simultaneously, but, rather, are given to the various local wage areas at different times during the year, an appropriations ceiling will not treat all Federal blue collar employees equally. For instance, those who receive their raises in January will have their wages affected for approximately 9 months, while workers who receive their raises in June will have their wages capped only for 4 months. It is hard to imagine that any organization in the private sector would pursue such an inequitable policy, and I do not believe we in the Congress should either. There is no system at present to allow either the President or the Congress to fairly apply a ceiling on blue collar raises, particularly in an appropriations bill. Besides, the President's remarks of April 11, before the American Society of Newspaper Editors, when he announced that he wanted Federal pay increases kept at 5.5 percent, were specifically directed to white collar (general schedule) employees, with no mention of blue collars:

> Last year, Federal white collar salaries rose by more than 7 percent. I intend to propose a limit of about 5½ percent this year, thereby setting an example for labor and industry to moderate price and wage increases.

Thus, while it appears that the House Appropriations Committee was following President Carter's wishes by reporting sections 860 and 861, this is not the case.

Additionally, my colleagues should be aware that the continuing distortion of pay comparability for Federal employees enforces the arguments for collective bargaining. If the President and/or the Congress persist in depressing Federal salaries and wages, the efforts to have Federal pay set at the bargaining table would be strengthened. We should not overlook this fact.

Finally, I know there has been much concern lately over the growing power of the Appropriations Committees at the expense of the authorizing committees, and I believe sections 860 and 861 are further evidence that these concerns are not groundless. Public Law 92-392 refined and codified a complex procedure for establishing pay comparability in the blue collar wage area. It was developed by the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, and it is this law which should be amended to allow for the equitable application of a pay "cap" for Government blue collar personnel. Therefore, sections 860 and 861 do not attempt to usurp the authority of an existing legislative program, but are an "end run" around the members of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, who have jurisdiction over Federal pay.

So, as you can see, although sections 860 and 861 are well intentioned, they are not sound pieces of legislation. Thus, I urge you to strike these provisions from H.R. 13635.●

THE NATURAL GAS BILL

HON. ANTHONY TOBY MOFFETT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues the following Washington Post article on the natural gas bill. As this article points out, the current agreement is very different from the bill passed by the House last August.

The Energy Information Administration report cited in the article states that the compromise agreement will cost $32 billion more than the House bill. This would result in consumers paying from $28.5 billion to $50 billion more for gas through 1985. Yet, the EIA projects supplies to increase only by 0.2 trillion cubic feet over the House bill—last year's production alone was nearly 20 trillion cubic feet. The inflationary effect of paying $32 billion more for virtually the same amount of gas is disconcerting to say the least.

Finally, both the article and the EIA study indicate that the twin goals of conserving gas supplies for high priority users and protecting residential users from sharp price increases will not be met. Rather, the compromise is seen as providing less gas at higher prices to these users than would have occurred under the House bill.

[From the Washington Post, July 30, 1978]

AFTER SQUEEZING THROUGH HILL PIPELINE, GAS BILL NOW SKEWED TOWARD INDUSTRY

(By William Greider)

When President Carter first proposed his national energy plan, one principle was clear: The nation's dwindling pool of natural gas would be saved for the homeowners of America. Industry would be coaxed or driven, by taxes, prices and regulatory rules, to shift to other less-precious fuels.

Now, 15 months later, that priority has been reversed.

Carter's compromise natural gas bill, scheduled this week or next for an up-or-down climax vote in the Senate, is skewed in the other direction—big industry is supposed to get more natural gas in the future, a lot more, while homeowners and businesses are expected to get along on less.

The reason for this is simple, according to C. William Fischer, deputy administrator of the Department of Energy's quasi-independent analytical section. The final prices set for homeowners are much higher in the compromise measure than they were in the original plan—high enough to drive residential and commercial users away from gas, not toward it.

The NEP originally envisioned an increase in residential-commercial consumption of natural gas of 8 percent by 1985. The compromise bill, according to an evaluation by Fischer's Energy Information Administration, will produce a decrease of about 4 percent. Total industrial consumption, on the other hand, was expected to hold even or decline slightly by 1985, as companies switched to coal and other fuels. Now the administration bill claims that total industrial use will grow by 10 to 14 percent in the next six years.

"There are rational reasons for that," said Fischer, "the main one being the price differentials. . . . The compromise has a price for residential of $3.31 [per thousand cubic feet] by 1985. That's a significantly higher price, 57 cents higher than the national energy plan. That would tend to drive down consumption in the residential sector."

In terms of future consumption, said a staff professional on the House Commerce Committee, "industrial users are just coming out the big winners."

This is one of the fundamental mutations that have crept into the president's program during its arduous journey through Congress, a trip which has left all sides exhausted and politically jangled by so many bargains made and unmade, so many angry speeches and private deals, so many fortunes won or lost in the fine print of this legislation.

No one seems very eager for the Senate showdown ahead. Another filibuster is expected from the pro-consumer liberals who are opposed to deregulation and higher gas prices, in any form. They may be joined this time by a few pro-oil conservatives who are disgusted with the compromise's extremely complex formula for phased deregulation over seven to 10 years. They think the oil industry should kill this bill and try again next year for immediate deregulation of gas prices.

The administration hopes to break the filibuster on the third or fourth try, depending upon a middle spectrum of Democrats and Republicans, senators who are either loyal to the Carter program or loyal to the oil industry, who started out this fight on opposite sides.

The political imperative that unites them now is to pass something, to settle the matter once and for all, even if the victory is riddled with impurities. Passage of the gas bill would give the president a much-needed political victory and, for industry, it promises what gas producers have been fighting 24 years to accomplish—an end to federal control over interstate natural gas prices.

What would this bill do for America? Or to America? as the critics would say. All answers and explanations must be hedged by this note of caution: virtually all aspects of this measure—the economic impact, the impact on energy production, the fine print and the larger purposes—are the subject of intense dispute at this moment, extremely technical arguments that are not likely to be resolved by the final political rhetoric coming up in the Senate and the House.

In simplest terms, the measure will authorize a substantial transfer of income within American society—at least $28.5 billion over the next six years—from all the consumers of natural gas to all the companies that produce it. Some critics claim that the transfer will be much larger, closer to $50 billion, but at the very least the gas industry should derive an increase of 17 percent in its expected revenue.

The White House inflation watchers, who are concerned about the inflationary effects of government regulation for safety and the environment, have not shown much interest in the inflationary potential of deregulation. An inquiry at the Council on Wage and Price Stability produced this response: "We have not done anything with natural gas. It's a very complex, complicated thing. With our limited staff, there wasn't any way we could get into it."

The Department of Energy claims that the $28.5 billion is a good investment for the nation with these benefits: Increased gas production would be stimulated by the higher prices. The nightmare of regional gas shortages in hard winters would be eliminated. The prices would also shift industrial use of gas from wasteful boiler burning to more essential purposes like manufacturing processes. The bill also proposes gradual melding of the two gas markets which now cause so many headaches to energy planners, users and producers—the interstate national market whose prices are controlled by federal government and the unregulated intrastate market of Texas, Louisiana and Oklahoma, where smaller independent producers can sell gas for a much higher price now, as long as their fuel doesn't cross state lines. The dual market is blamed for many problems—large and small companies hold their gas for the higher-priced southwest market, if they can, while northern customers come up short.

Top aides to Energy Secretary James R. Schlesinger did a bit of backing and filling on the question of who will get this new gas production stimulated by the bill. Jim Bishop, Schlesinger's press secretary, first responded by pointing out that the national energy plan mandated a natural gas policy favoring homeowners.

"That's the heart of the Carter policy," Bishop explained. "Gas is going to be reserved for the homeowner."

After more discussion, Bishop referred the question to DOE experts, including Leslie J. Goldman, deputy assistant secretary, who likewise expressed disbelief that any DOE documents were claiming increased industrial consumption as a consequence of the natural gas bill.

Later, Goldman examined the figures and responded with a clarification: Yes, industrial uses would increase—by as much as 2 trillion cubic feet by 1985—and residential use would be held even.

Goldman argued that these consequences would still be consistent with the President's plan. Total industrial consumption will go up, he said, but the wasteful uses will go down—particularly the use of natural gas for electricity generation and oil refineries. He claims that no oil refineries will be burning natural gas for heat by 1985. Furthermore, he insists that the residential users won't be hurt because insulation and other conservation measures will save so much gas that many more homes will burn the same amount of natural gas by 1985.

It should be noted that some private industry analysts think the administration's projections on future consumption are strange, to put it nicely. They point out that homeowners have fewer options than industry about choosing a fuel to burn. A large factory can easily switch from gas to oil, as many have done in recent years, while residential use of natural gas has continued to increase.

Once a home is hooked up for gas, the owner is not likely to switch, even if stuck with a sharp price increase. Total industrial consumption has declined slowly since the early 1970s when energy prices shot up—a trend that might be accelerated not reversed, by future price increases.

Homeowners have always paid much higher rates for natural gas than industrial or commercial customers. The original plan favoring homeowners was to shrink that difference drastically but, as various amendments and industrial exemptions were bargained into the pricing formula, that goal evaporated. The final version does reduce the gap, but by only a few cents, from an average of 85 cents to 72 cents.

The irony of all this back and forth is that the substantial increase targeted for industry may be an embarrassment to energy planners—but has also become one of the major political selling points for their bill. Administration lobbyists, according to one DOE memo, should remind business and labor and senators of this point:

"Industrial use of gas could increase by more than 2 trillion cubic feet; there would be no curtailment of firm demand. The gas supply in the heavily industrialized midwest would increase by nearly 50 percent."

The unions are an important battleground in this political struggle—union members are homeowners who oppose higher heating bills but they are also workers who need industrial growth for jobs. The administration argument is that, on balance, the compromise bill hurts homeowners less than the alternative of total deregulation and it will also stimulate economic growth. Unions, as a matter of principle, oppose deregulation, but the question is how hard they will fight against Carter's version of it.

"The consumer folks," said one administration official, "are trying to get the unions to look at this in terms of higher prices. We're trying to get them to look at it in terms of jobs."

On a regional basis, the administration is selling broad economic benefits to most sections of the country, quite apart from the national impact of higher prices for everyone. The sales pitch goes like this:

The midwestern industrial cities—the great centers of steel, glass, autos—are being promised a reliable supply for healthy industrial growth.

Midwestern agriculture, which depends heavily on natural gas for chemical fertilizer and corn-drying and other processes, will pay more for gas—but agriculture production has been exempted from the higher-priced pool that affects most industrial users. This same argument will appeal to other farm regions, like the South, where textiles and food-processing plants are also exempted from the higher industrial prices.

In the East, the increase in natural gas is supposed to displace more expensive fuels—liquefied natural gas and synthetic gas—that are used there in small amounts, thus moderating the average costs for everyone. If you are paying $3.60 or so for LNG, then natural gas at $2.13 looks pretty good.

For New England, which doesn't burn much gas in any case, the argument heard on Capitol Hill is any gas-pricing measure that raises the cost of manufacturing for the rest of the nation is bound to help the depressed industrial base of New England.

For the West, there is an additional argument: passage of the natural gas bill would pave the way for pipeline projects to bring vast new quantities of gas by the late 1980s from both Alaska and Mexico.

The Carter administration suspended negotiations with the Mexican government on an import project for its newly discovered gas until after passage of this bill. Mexico wants a guaranteed price of $2.60, well above the current market, and the bargaining is expected to resume if Congress raises the U.S. price closer to that target.

The Alaskan gas pipeline is waiting on the higher prices too. A higher price base would make it easier to arrange financing for the mammoth project. In the meantime, states like Alaska have arranged an exemption of their own—ensuring that state-enacted severance taxes on natural gas will be excluded from the federal pricing scale.

Everyone in Congress understands that the major regional beneficiary would be the southwest, though the benefits won't be spread evenly there by any means. The oil-producing states are where most of America's natural gas lies and that's where most of the $28.5 billion would go. The administration reminds everyone that the prices and the cash transfer would have been much worse under the total deregulation bill passed by the Senate last year.

The pro-consumer opponents of this compromise would argue that all this money doesn't have to change hands in order to accomplish the various economic benefits promised by the Carter administration. Their solution, in the extreme, would be simply to extend federal price control to all that intrastate gas production in Texas, Louisiana and Oklahoma and then, by federal regulation, allocate the sale of that gas to the customers who will need it most.

If there is any doubt that the oil industry came out of this legislative struggle with good results, listen to Sen. J. Bennett Johnston (D-La.) addressing a meeting of Texas independent gas producers in Houston last month, trying to persuade them to support the compromise:

"I tell you this—compared to the president's program, compared to the House bill, compared to what we feared and, frankly, even compared to what we had hoped, this is a magnificent bill, believe it or not."

Many of the smaller independents do not believe it. They have smaller wells that sell gas in the unregulated intrastate market—so this bill puts them under the thumb of Uncle Sam for the first time. Their gas production would become subject to a nightmarish system of price categories—17 different flavors of natural gas or 23, depending on who does the counting. This "reregulation," as DOE officials now call it, is supposed to expire by 1985, but the oil men are skeptical—they fear that a future president or a future Congress will change their minds and they'll be stuck permanently under federal regulation.

In any case, the largest benefits will flow to the larger companies that control the major reservoirs, either onshore or in offshore waters. This is natural gas that would inevitably be sold to interstate customers in the North, whether price controls continue or not.

When Carter announced his energy plan, the regulated interstate price for new gas was an average of $1.42, up from 52 cents in 1976. The president first proposed $1.75. The argument moved upward to $1.93. The compromise bill envisions a final price by 1985 in the neighborhood of $2.60 per thousand cubic feet.

Even allowing for the distortion of inflation built into those figures, they demonstrate crudely the way this argument has gone—in favor of the producers. Major companies that have purchased expensive offshore leases, as one petroleum analyst puts it, "were sitting on a lot of 50-cent gas that's now going to sell for $1.80 or $2."

The administration is "cautiously confident" that this package of interests will sell the natural gas legislation, when the votes are counted. Working in its favor now is plain fatigue: everyone is sick of fighting over this horribly complex subject.

"What we hear on the Hill," said one energy aide, is: "Let's get it through. Let's get it out of here."●

TRIBUTE TO JOHN W. "JACK" JACQUES

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with sorrow that I note the passing of John W. "Jack" Jacques, of Slater, Mo. Mr. Jacques, president of the State Bank of Slater for 30 years, was an esteemed member of the banking profession for 52 years. He was a member of the Slater Airport Board and the Zoning and Adjustment Board. From 1921 until 1964, he served as treasurer of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. Mr. Jacques was a member of the Slater First Baptist Church, a Scoutmaster, and a Mason.

I join all who mourn the passing of this good man.●

ILLEGAL ALIENS

HON. GEORGE H. MAHON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, today as we debate our Nation's foreign aid program, I think it important that we take note of a related problem—that of the increasing tide of illegal aliens coming into this country.

The following article from the New York Times is based on a new book, "The Illegals," by a distinguished Texan, Grace Halsell. She is a talented and responsible writer who has been my very good friend for many years. I would commend the article to my colleagues for the insight it provides into the growing problem of illegal aliens.

For two years I have been living with people on both sides of the Mexican border investigating the illegal immigrants who are entering this country.

Our border with Mexico is a line on a map that, in reality, is difficult to discern. On either side of that 2,000 mile border that runs from Brownsville, Tex., to just south of San Diego, Calif., there is the same expanse of brilliant sky, the same soil producing the same fruits and vegetables, and people who feel equally at home in Mexico or in the Southwest.

The borderlands comprising four American states and six Mexican states, are not two distinct countries so much as a binational, bicultural regional entity, a zone of interlocking economic, social and cultural interests.

Cruz Sedillo, 87 years old, can trace his family history in the Southwest for 12 generations, to the 1500's. A native of New Mexico, he observed, "Hispanos have always lived in the Southwest. We're second only to the Indians. And, like the Indians, we are an indigenous people."

The Spaniards were here more than two decades before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock. El Paso, Tex., has been Spanish and Mexican far longer than it has been part of the United States.

All of what is now the Southwest once belonged to Mexico. In 1846, with the discovery of gold in California, President James K. Polk ordered United States troops to march into Mexico. By taking California, and the land between, he extended the United States to the Pacific.

Henry David Thoreau went to jail rather than pay taxes to support this war. Abraham Lincoln, then a freshman Congressman, accused President Polk of ordering United States troops "into the midst of a peaceful Mexican settlement, purposely to bring on a war." Ulysses S. Grant, a young second lieutenant in the Mexican war, called it a "political war," one of the "most unjust" ever waged.

By winning the war, the United States not only annexed half of Mexico, but acquired all the Mexican citizens who were living in the Southwest.

Mexicans still observe the anniversaries of their defeats at Chapultepec and Molino del Rey as national days of fasting and prayer. And as recently as 1943, Mexican schools were using maps designating the land we acquired as "territory temporarily in the hands of the United States."

This history is important in understanding why so many Mexicans come over the border illegally. I interviewed scores of Mexican nationals in American jails who had crossed without documents.

And, on several occasions, to better understand their experiences, I swam the Rio Grande, crawled through the sewers of Tijuana and was guided at night through the infamous Smugglers Canyon" near San Diego.

Undocumented workers do not feel they commit a crime in traveling north from Mexico. They call it going to el norte. As far as the Southwest is concerned, we are the legals, the Anglos the illegals," one Mexican said.

Hispanos are the nation's youngest and fastest growing group and soon they will outnumber blacks as the largest minority. The largest number has come here from Mexico and they are scattered throughout this country—in New York and Chicago as well as the Southwest.

Today, every fifth Texan is of Mexican origin. In some of that state's southern counties, their proportion is as high as 98 percent. Los Angeles has 1.5 million Mexican-Americans and, after Mexico City, is the second largest "Mexican" city. Before 1985, it is predicted, Mexicans-Americans will comprise a majority of California's population.

Already Hispanos swing many important elections. Some have argued that they delivered Texas—and Presidential victory—to Jimmy Carter. Others say they will determine the future for Governor Edmund G. Brown Jr. of California.

Mexican immigrants often retain their traditions and language. Many come from small villages, they retain customs and hold deep personal and religious convictions. The newcomers constantly renew the Mexican heritage of Mexican-Americans. And in doing so they are aided, as no earlier immigrant group was, by civil-rights legislation.

The United States defeated Mexico and took the Southwest," a Mexican-American, Roberto Salazar, told me. Now I think the conquerors are being conquered. Anglo culture is being influenced more than it wants to be, or is aware of."

Mexicans as well as Anglos are moving into to fastest growing part of the United States, and who will control the land there is still in doubt. Mexican-Americans may regain, through the ballot box, the control they lost through war.●

FDA'S PROPOSED RESTRICTIONS ON ANTIBIOTICS

HON. CHARLES ROSE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I insert in the RECORD a report, "Antibiotics in Animal Feeds: Risk vs. Benefit," outlining the scientific and economic concerns of the Food and Drug Administration's proposed restrictions on the use of antibiotics in animal feeds.

Part V shall present the first part of a U.S. Department of Agriculture briefing paper on the FDA's proposed antibiotics use restrictions:

SCIENCE—DEFENDING 25 YEARS OF BENEFITS

THE SCIENTIFIC BASIS OF FDA'S CASE

In 1970, the Food & Drug Administration established a task force to study whether antibiotics used subtherapeutically in animal feeds should be restricted. The move followed a report from a committee in England that recommended restricting the use of antibiotics in animal feed. England subsequently required the use of many antibiotics in animal feed be limited to prescription by a licensed veterinarian. The FDA task force was headed by Dr. Van Houweling. His special assistant was Gerald B. Guest, who is now acting deputy associate director of the Bureau of Veterinary Medicine.

In an interview, Dr. Guest explained the way resistance is developed in bacteria exposed to antibiotics and how that resistance can be passed from one bacterium to another He said that until 1960 scientists assumed that resistance developed due to chance genetic mutations of bacteria exposed to antibiotics. However, scientists found in 1960 that genetic material carrying the resistance can be passed directly from one bacterium to another. The resistance can be passed from a non-pathogenic strain of bacteria to one that does produce disease.

"If there are a few resistant bacteria in an animal's gut and you put the antibiotic in, you select for the resistant organisms by clearing out the sensitive ones. A population will develop that is 90 to 95 percent drug resistant. When the animal defecates, bacteria that get into the environment are drug resistant. We know they stay that way for long periods of time.

"They contaminate the environment of farm families. We know from studies that farm families, if they have animals receiving antibiotics, carry more germ resistance than families that live in cities. That's because they get the bacteria on their hands. The other factor may be that they're handling antibiotic dusts and residues from mixing operations."

Dr. Guest said scientists know there is a common pool of various kinds of bacteria that can be passed back and forth between animals and human beings.

The 1972 report of the FDA Task Force on the Use of Antibiotics in Animal Feeds summarized the scientific findings that FDA used as the basis for restricting the use of such antibiotics:

"1. The use of antibiotics, especially subtherapeutic amounts, favors the selection and development of single and multiple antibiotic resistant and R-factor-bearing bacteria. (R-factor is the genetic material carrying the resistance.)

"2. Animals which have received either subtherapeutic and/or therapeutic amounts of antibiotic in feed may serve as a reservoir of antibiotic-resistant pathogens and nonpathogens. These reservoirs of pathogens can produce infections.

"3. The prevalence of multi-resistant R-factor-bearing pathogenic bacteria in animals has increased and has been related to the use of antibiotics.

"4. Organisms resistant to antibacterial agents have been found on meat and meat products.

"5. There has been an increase in the prevalence of antibiotic resistant bacteria in man."

The concern of FDA, and the reason for Commissioner Kennedy' decision is that resistant pathogens could cause disease outbreaks in humans for which there would be no antibiotic treatment. A number of human diseases resist antibiotic treatment now, according to the testimony of Dr. Richard P. Novick, Chief, Department of Plasmid Biology, The Public Health Research Institute of the City of New York, Inc. These include E. coli diarrhea, pneumonia, salmonellosis and gonorrhea, Dr. Novick told the Senate Agriculture Subcommittee on Agriculture Research and General Legislation.

The source of this resistance, whether hospitals or animal feed, is not known.

THE SCIENTIFIC REBUTTAL

"Apart from the technicalities of the feared transfer of antibiotic resistance from long recognized resistant strains and species of enteric microflora (intestinal bacteria) to other species which could conceivably cross over into humans and, at least theoretically, elicit an uncontrollable epidemic in man, the fact rather solidly remains that after 25 years of feeding a multiplicity of various antibotics, coccidiostats, anthelmintics, sulfonamides, nitrofurans, etc. to over 100 billion head of livestock in the U.S. alone, and perhaps another 50 billion abroad, it has never happened yet," declared Dr. Robert H. White-Stevens, chairman, Bureau of Conservation and Environmental Science, Rutgers University, at the Dairy and Poultry Subcommittee hearings. "This does not mean it will never happen, but only that the odds that it will are somewhere around one in 100 billion or more."

Dr. Jukes, the University of California medical physics professor, testified: "The question of resistance-transfer is fascinating.

Careful laboratory studies show that this takes place more readily in the test tube than it does in the digestive tract."

Dr. Jukes cited an experiment on antibiotic resistance that compared a community in Iowa where antibiotics were used in animal feed with an urban population in Connecticut. "There was no difference in the pattern of antibiotic resistance between the two populations, with a few exceptions," Dr. Jukes said. "The tetracycline resistance, however, showed no geographical pattern. If anything, it was somewhat lower in Iowa."

A position paper issued by Pfizer, Inc., entitled "In Defense of Animal Feed Antibiotics," disputes the main scientific points advanced by FDA as the basis for restricting the use of antibiotics in animal feed.

Pfizer said that even though intestinal bacteria in humans and animals are the same strains, it was found in one industry study "that fecal specimens from human subjects in daily contact with calves showed no significant differences in the marked R-factor, marked E coli (a bacterium) or changes in resistant coliforms when comparisons were made with respect to whether or not the calves received tetracyclines."

Both Pfizer and Dr. Jukes reported on experiments where attempts have been made to colonize human intestines using massive doses of E. Coli of animal origin. "In general, E. Coli of animal origin have been shown to be poor colonizers of the human intestinal tract, even when exceptionally large doses of bacteria were ingested," Pfizer concluded.

Generally, the position of those supporting the use of subtherapeutic levels of antibiotics in animal feeds is that the link between use of antibiotics in animals and the development of resistant bacteria in humans has never been established. They contend that the resistance in humans probably is due to the use and misuse of antibiotics to treat human diseases.

Even FDA's Dr. Van Houweling says the link between animals and humans is very difficult to establish. At the OTA's first public meeting, Dr. Van Houweling said, "To identify bacteria in animals and then have them show up in a person several weeks or a month later technologically has not been achieved. We have to use circumstantial evidence and say, "Yes, we put the associations together and have come to this conclusion."

THE EFFICACY OF ANTIBIOTICS

The fact that using antibiotics in animal feeds promotes growth and improves feed conversion has been well established for a quarter of a century.

Dr. Byerly presented a paper on "Efficacy of Drugs Used as Feed Additives" at the OTA meeting. He said, "Antibiotics used as growth promotant levels in the feed may save two million metric tons of feed a year. In the absence of equally effective alternates, this accounts for 400,000 metric tons of red and poultry meat—about 100,000 metric tons of beef and veal, 250,000 metric tons of pork, 45,000 metric tons of chicken, and 5,000 metric tons of turkey."

Dr. White-Stevens was a pioneer in the use of antibiotics in animal feed. He testified that growth promotion is due to the antibiotics' effect on bacteria and other organisms in the farm animal. These organisms "compete intestinally for its food, secrete undesirable toxins, or infect and pathologically ravage its tissues."

In addition to promoting growth, antibiotics are used subtherapeutically in feed to control animal diseases. White-Stevens said these diseases included "shipping fever and foot rot in steers; scours and liver abcesses in calves; transmissable gastro enteritis, scours and rhinotracheitis . . .; coccidiosis, aerosacculitis, synovitis and 'rot gut' in chicks; and blackhead, sinusitis, and blue comb in turkeys, plus a score of other diseases that plague the husbandman."

ECONOMICS—WHO PAYS THE PIPER

THE ECONOMICS BENEFITS

The core of the case for continued use of antibiotics in animal feed lies in the demonstrated economic benefits vs. theoretical and unproven risks.

FDA readily concedes that subtherapeutic use of antibiotics benefits both producers and American consumers. Examining the economic consequences of restricting the subtherapeutic use of tetracyclines in feedlot cattle and swine, the FDA concluded that American consumers would pay $1.9 billion more for meat each year if tetracyclines were not used. American Cyanamid Co., a drug producer, said "this translates into an increase of 7 cents a pound for beef, and 15 cents a pound for pork. And this does not even take into account any death losses resulting from increased disease among animals on the farm."

FDA did not make a similar analysis of the impact of its proposed restrictions on poultry prices. However, in another analysis based on 1970 figures, FDA calculated that the use of antibiotics in animal feed provided a $33 million benefit for broiler producers and $13.9 million for turkey producers.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture estimated that the use of antibiotics in feed was worth $100 million to drug producers; $1 billion to the poultry and meat industry, and $2.1 billion to consumers. Scientists at the Texas Agricultural Experiment Station estimated that two million additional crop acres would be required to produce the added 103 million bushels of corn and 23 million bushels of soybeans that would be needed to maintain beef and pork production, if the use of antibiotics in feed was stopped.

All of these estimates are based only on the changes in the efficiency of feed conversion. They do not take into account the greater losses from disease and from higher mortality among animals and birds that did not get antibiotics in their feed. This would be difficult to estimate. But diseases could spread rapidly among high concentrations of chickens in modern poultry operations, or among cattle in feedlots.

THE "DOMINO PRINCIPLE"

The economic facts notwithstanding, FDA is going ahead with its restrictions on penicillin and tetracyclines.

Commissioner Kennedy told the Dairy and Poultry Subcommittee that "when we are confronted with what we view as a serious public health risk, we are not allowed to consider the economic side of the issue. We simply have to make that risk evaluation."

Fred Holt of the Animal Health Institute contends that if the commissioner cannot weigh the economic benefits, then no drug intended for food producing animals is safe from being banned. He said in an interview, "If we can't consider the value to the grower, if any risk, no matter how small, allows FDA to remove a product from the market, then we're not just looking at these specific products (penicillin and tetracyclines). If this philosophy is employed, it will have a domino effect and we could end up with virtually no feed additives available to agriculture."

Dr. Kennedy said in his announcement restricting the use of penicillin and tetracyclines, "These actions should be viewed as a first step toward FDA's ultimate goal of eliminating, to the extent possible, the nontherapeutic use in animals of any drugs needed to treat disease in man. In our view, the benefit of using these drugs routinely as over-the-counter products to help animals grow faster, or in prophylactic (disease prevention) programs does not outweigh the potential risks posed to people."

RIGHT FOR WRONG REASONS?

Dr. Kennedy's apparently hasty declaration of FDA's policy intentions did not catch everyone flatfooted. The drug ban position paper which he adopted had been in the making for several years. With this attitude developing within FDA, some drug manufacturers introduced "animal use only" antibiotics to the American market. (In fact, even before regulatory action, one manufacturer introduced a non-therapeutic feed antibiotic solely for growth promotion and feed efficiency).

Universally, they agree with the Animal Health Institute that there is probably no scientific problem with regard to the cross-resistance factor in human and animal bacteria. But they feel a case can be made for the use of alternatives as a means of at least circumventing what may become a regulatory problem.

Supporting their animal-use only argument, they say, is increasing evidence that some of the more popular antibiotics require higher and higher usage levels to produce the same effectiveness they did when first introduced. (Bacitracin, for example, is cited as one drug which was fed at 10 grams a ton 10 years ago, but which most mixers use today at a minimum of 25 grams.)

If animal-use manufacturers are raising an issue, in order to circumvent a marketing problem, they at least pose this question: Aside from human risk, which they consider absolutely minimal in current drugs, what will increased resistance of animal bacteria face, given continued exposure to certain antibiotics?

It isn't the human Dr. Kennedy should be trying to protect, long-range, they are saying in effect, but the animal world! They are consistent, however, in criticizing Dr. Kennedy's tack. They don't want the FDA camel to get his nose under the tent, either, because they think FDA's human risk assumption is entirely wrong. This sets the stage, then, for examining industry's unanimous posture on the proposed drug ban.

THE POSITION OF INDUSTRY

The meat producing, animal feed, and animal health industries have taken strong positions that the use of antibiotics for growth promotion and disease control is not only desirable but absolutely essential.

Oakley Ray, president of the American Feed Manufacturer's Association, said the withdrawal of antibiotics used in animal feed would mean "we would have to go back to the kind of agriculture I grew up with, where there were 300 birds on one farm."

Lee Boyd, vice president of the same association, noted that the Soviet Union and other European countries were adopting the "factory model" for producing poultry. He said this method will be threatened in the United States if FDA withdraws its approval of our using antibiotics to control disease. This would mean that U.S. producers would be going backward. Boyd said this would put the United States at a disadvantage in world markets.

All the representatives of the meat, feed and drug industries stress that they want nothing in meat that will endanger human health. Ed Covell, chairman of the National Broiler Council, said, "It is our position that such substances must be withdrawn when they have proven harmful, but not on the basis of unproven theories."

THE OUTLOOK

The battle lines are just beginning to form. The poultry and meat producing industries have a number of solid allies in the congressional committees on agriculture. But hearings being held by other committees may or may not be less friendly. The issue will not be resolved by the agriculture committees alone, or even by Congress alone. Unless Dr.

Kennedy backs down, which few people expect, the penicillin and tetracycline regulations will be challenged in court. This is a cumbersome, time-consuming process.

In Congress, the subcommittees dealing with health, the environment, and consumer affairs are beginning to be heard from. Because of jurisdictional questions, these committees can have much more impact on the antibiotic issue than the more friendly agriculture committees.

In hearings before the House Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations, FDA was criticized sharply for moving too slowly to restrict the use of penicillin and tetracycline in animal feeds. Some committee members felt the antibiotics represented a sufficient health hazard to require immediate action. The parent Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has jurisdiction over FDA legislation and therefore more influence than the Agriculture Committees.

In general, knowledgeable observers expressed some confidence that the FDA actions would not withstand the scrutiny of the courts. Most believe that the evidence weighs heavily in favor of continued use of subtherapeutic levels of antibiotics in animal feed.

EFFECT ON THE PRODUCER

"It is impossible to produce today's abundant supply of high-quality, reasonably-priced eggs, without the use of various pharmaceuticals that science has provided," declared James Fleming, vice president for governmental relations, United Egg Producers. In the Dairy and Poultry Subcommittee hearings, he said: "In 1950, the average commercial hen produced only 174 eggs. In 1976, the average was 235 eggs. Feed conversion improved from 5.4 pounds of feed per dozen eggs in 1950 to 4.1 pounds per dozen eggs in 1976.

"What do these figures mean in dollars and cents?

"Today, if a farmer owns 10,000 commercial hens (today's average is about 30,000), he would use 127.3 tons less feed per year than he would have needed in 1950. At today's feed prices ($160 per ton) he would save $20,368 a year on feed alone . . . it is impossible to estimate the savings resulting from mass production technique."

John Shaheen, director of the Northeastern Poultry Producers Council, testified at the same hearings. He said, "Without an antibiotic feed program, producers would lose to mortality, morbidity and condemnations up to 10.5 percent more broilers, 10 percent more turkeys, and 12 percent more laying hens. To offset (these) losses, producers would be forced to raise more birds . . . which in turn would significantly increase feed grain consumption and energy requirements."

An FDA study using 1970 figures estimated that the use of antibiotics in animal feeds provided a one-cent economic advantage per broiler due to reduced feed and labor costs. This would amount to $1,000 for a broiler producer who sold 100,000 birds. The same study showed that using antibiotics yielded a 12 cent economic advantage for each turkey raised.

The economics of antibiotics have not been analyzed in terms of the producers' return on investment, the impact of capacity when higher costs trigger reduced demand, or changes in demand for specific meat products because the FDA action will have an unequal impact on different species.

It is clear that use of antibiotics and other drugs has contributed to the concentration of the poultry and meat industries.

The Pfizer position paper estimated that "73% of all meat and poultry in the U.S. is produced in this type of intensive operation." A number of observers fear that the ultimate result of FDA's curent position on the use of drugs in animal feeds will be to make intensive animal husbandry impossible. Without the pharmaceutical tools to control diseases in confined populations of animals, producers would have to revert to dispersion of animals in smaller and more scattered flocks and herds.

ANOTHER KIND OF RISK

The Pfizer position paper speculated that, in addition to economic considerations, the FDA proposal also raises new questions about human health hazards coming from disease-producing bacteria from livestock. "Ironically the proposed ban on certain feed antibiotics could create a more serious human health problem than it is intended to prevent," said the paper. Pfizer said the following scenario was not impossible:

"Morbidity of livestock increases precipitously—and a host of sick animals abound.

"These are hurried off to slaughter.

"Meat comes to market contaminated with high concentrations of bacterial pathogens.

"Dysentery reappears, and epidemics of salmonellosis and other dysenteries become more frequent.

"Regulatory bodies are condemned for permitting unsanitary food to reach the consumer.

"Policy reversal is attempted, confusion is compounded and science policy mechanisms are only further discredited."

Pfizer did not address the economic impact of such a scenario. It seems likely that consumers would buy much less meat after a contamination episode.

COPING WITH THE ISSUE

Producers' response to FDA's proposed ban on penicillin and tetracyclines falls into two categories: what to do at the production level, and what to do politically.

The FDA says there are substitutes that can replace penicillin and the tetracyclines. Some it lists: flavormycin, virginiamycin, bacitracin (zinc and methylene disalicyclate), erythromycin, bambermycins, carbadox, oleandomycin, tylosin, sulfaquinoxaline, hygromycin (B), sulfadimethoxine-ormetoprim, arsanilic acid, roxarsone, carborsone, sodium arsanilate, linomycin and monesin.

FDA also maintains that animal diseases can still be treated therapeutically and that producers can still use penicillin and tetracyclines if they have a veterinarian's prescription. Animal scientists and producers counter that there are too few veterinarians in the United States to treat all sick animals. J.R. Legates, Dean, School of Agriculture and Life Sciences, North Carolina State University, says that North Carolina would be particularly hard hit since there are no veterinarians in 18 out of its 100 counties.

FDA also recommends that disease be controlled through improved sanitation, quarantines, and isolation of sick birds and animals. Animal producers generally respond that these methods are difficult, expensive, and often ineffective.

WITH ONE VOICE

Chairman Rose in his interview with Watt Publishing Company urged "everyone in industry and agribusiness to be aware of these proposals, their possible impact, and to get the facts to their representatives in the House and Senate."

They should make sure, he said, that "all segments of the poultry and meat industries join in a coordinated effort to speak to this problem with one voice so the issue does not get decided in a vacuum or without all having a chance to be heard."

Senators and Congressmen are just as confused as laymen about the safety, or lack of it, of drugs used in humans and animal health, Representative Rose asserts. He suggested a well-funded, well-planned educational approach, not an adversary position. "Say what you believe, and say it convincingly," he suggests, "using your trade associations to provide organized leadership."●

BALANCE(S) OF POWER—BOOK II C(i), NATIONAL RESOURCES

HON. JOHN B. BRECKINRIDGE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, in the continuing series of articles on the strategic balance of power between the United States and the Soviet Union, we turn next to the important factor of natural resources. Although our Nation is blessed with a significant wealth of resources, we are by no means as self-sufficient in raw materials as the Soviet Union.

The Soviet advantage is particularly striking in energy resources and the use of those resources as this article by C. Sharp Cook, entitled "Their Energy—Our Crisis," demonstrates. As we strive to formulate an energy policy designed to meet national needs without damaging our strategic position, we need to be reminded of Soviet strengths in this regard.

The following article first appeared in the U.S. Naval Institute Proceedings, August 1976. The article follows:

THEIR ENERGY—OUR CRISIS

(By C. Sharp Cook)

Nikita Khrushchev's famous prophecy, "We will bury you," should be considered seriously by citizens of the United States, especially those of the younger generation who are now in high school and college. At the moment, the U.S. and Soviet postures relative to military and civilian strengths appear comparable. However, a look at future supplies of natural resources, especially energy resources, may well provide cause for alarm.

The statement by Khrushchev was not intended as a military threat but as a boast, to indicate the strength of the Soviet Union in overall productive capability. A better understanding of his meaning can be attained by quoting another statement: "We will survive you, we will be alive and stronger at your demise than we are now." Of course, if one side became overwhelmingly stronger militarily, no deterrent would exist to prevent it from overrunning the other with its armies.

At the moment, with the U.S.S.R. having problems in the production of enough wheat to feed its people, any concern about the competitive position of the Soviet Union might seem a bit ludicrous. However, closer examination of the extent of natural resources in the two countries quickly and clearly indicates the need for concern. Over the past century, the United States has rapidly depleted its originally abundant supplies of oil and natural gas and has wasted many of these supplies. While the per capita use of energy in this country is about six times the world average, the per capita use of energy in the U.S.S.R. is only about two and a half times the world average, a clear indication of the relative rate at which we are using our resources. U.S. domestic resources of oil and natural gas, if current exploitation rates continue, are sufficient to supply a significant fraction of our needs for slightly more than another quarter of a century.

On the other hand, the Soviets have found vast amounts of both these energy resources in Siberia. Furthermore, this abundance covers the whole spectrum of energy resources. Siberia, once thought to be a vast wasteland, has turned out to be a vast storehouse of almost any conceivable natural resource. For example, continuing explotation has revealed that the area probably holds more than half the coal reserves of the world, far outstripping those of the United States, even though most Americans consider the U.S. supplies of coal as abundant.

Although the Soviets are somewhat secretive about their supplies of oil and natural gas, enough information is available to reveal that they have tremendous quantities of both these commodities. One set of estimates, based on Soviet publications, indicates that the U.S.S.R. has 45% of the world's remaining natural gas and 37% of its oil-bearing areas. Since much of eastern and central Siberia has not yet been thoroughly explored, much more oil and natural gas will probably be found. In the period between 1956 and 1970, the natural gas reserves of western Siberia increased tenfold. Reserves are those resources that are known to exist and can be extracted economically. Whereas the oil-pumping rate in the United States has been declining since 1970, the pumping rate in the U.S.S.R. has been increasing. During both 1974 and 1975, the Soviet pumping rate exceeded that of the United States. The 1975 average was 9.79 million barrels a day for the U.S.S.R. and 8.36 million barrels a day for this nation.

Another source of energy is water power. Again, the supply in the Soviet Union is tremendous. The U.S.S.R has five huge river systems and a considerable part of the Amur system, which they share with the People's Republic of China. In the European part of the U.S.S.R., the Dnieper River has already been fully developed to take advantage of its hydroelectric power Development of the Volga River system is rapidly being completed. However, in Siberia the Ob, the Lena, and the Yenisey River systems are only partially developed and still have many good dam sites to be exploited. Full development of the hydroelectric potential of these five huge river systems could provide the complete electrical needs, including all residential, commercial, and industrial needs for between 70 and 100 million people. The Soviets may possess as much as 12% of the world's potential hydroelectric power. By comparison, the only area of the United States that can depend on hydroelectric power to supply essentially all its electrical energy needs is the Pacific Northwest One of the initial purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority was to take advantage of the hydroelectric potential of the Tennessee River system. However, that resource has long been surpassed, and now hydroelectric plants supply only a fraction of the electrical output of the TVA system.

The Soviets' nuclear power program is also going strong. They have a prototype breeder reactor in operation, at Shevchenko, on the northeast coast of the Caspian Sea. While environmental lobbyists actively oppose the construction of any nuclear reactors for power purposes in this country, no such wrangling exists in the Soviet Union regarding programs for the development of a fast breeder reactor. Few, if any, questions are raised about the safety on the environmental impact of the project, certainly none comparable to the ballot initiatives that have found their way to the voters in several of our states. As a result a continuing sustained effort is leading to a set of nuclear reactors that use nuclear fuel in the most efficient manner possible. Some technical problems have been encountered, but successful tests of breeder reactors in other countries, especially France, indicate that the Soviets will ultimately reach their goal.

In the U.S.S.R., fast breeder reactor development has followed an orderly progression in size and sophistication. A small breeder at Obninsk, went into operation in 1958 with an electrical output of 5 megawatts. A larger experimental reactor started operating in 1970 at Melekass. The prototype electric power plant breeder reactor at Shevchenko began operations in 1973 with a rated capacity output of 350 megawatts. However, this plant has thus far operated only up to 30% of full power. A larger 600 megawatt demonstration power plant is scheduled for completion in 1977 at Belogarsk, and a commercial power station using a breeder reactor, with a rated output of 1500 megawatts, is now being designed. This commercial power station is expected to be operating by 1985.

One of the world's largest research programs on nuclear fusion has been in existence in the U.S.S.R. for many years and has made many major contributions. The program includes research both on magnetically confined plasmas and on laser fusion. While nuclear fusion is still in the research stage and no guarantee exists that a practical source of energy will ever be developed, only those who work on such a program have any chance of success in developing a practical source of energy. Comparisons of research programs are difficult, but all indications are that the Soviet effort in nuclear-fusion research is as large, and maybe larger, than the American effort.

The Soviets have not been inactive in other areas of energy research. For example they have one of the two existing tidal electric generating stations in the world. Admittedly, this plant near Murmansk is only experimental, but it is one more tidal-energy plant than the United States possesses. Furthermore, estimates indicate that the long coastline of the Soviet Union has the potential for supplying relatively large quantities of tidal energy, probably about 20 percent of the world's total capability. The Soviets also have a leading, if not the leading, research program in the use of magnetohydrodynamics as a more efficient means of producing electrical energy from the burning of fossil fuels.

Even though the United States has the largest geothermal electric generating station in the world, at the Geysers just north of San Francisco, the electrical output of this station is still less than any new electric generating station powered with either fossil or nuclear fuel. The Soviets also have a number of geothermal projects, including a small electricity generating station at Pauzketsk at the southern end of the Kamchatka Peninsula and a number of experiments in the area of the Caspian Sea and the Black Sea.

When one compares the energy resources of this country and the U.S.S.R., it seems obvious that future generations of Americans are going to encounter problems unless proper precautions and planning take place. U.S. military services obtain an extremely large portion of their energy from fossil fuel, primarily oil. As domestic oil supplies disappear, other energy resources must be found to power the military or else a tremendous deterioration of our military posture will take place.

Even food production, an area in which we currently far outstrip the Soviets, is vitally dependent on energy resources to continue at its present rate. To maintain the present capability of the food industry, including production, distribution and preparation, the United States uses about nine calories of energy for each single calorie of food that reaches an American dining room table. Most of these nine calories come from fossil fuels, and most of these fuels are oil and natural gas, the ones of most concern. During 1974, a total of 2.5 percent of our natural gas supply went into making nitrogen fertilizer for use on the farms of America.

The time has long passed for a careful and thorough analysis of the energy situation in the United States, especially with respect to our future capability to compete in the world arena with the Soviet Union. A full and honest evaluation of the potential effects of the huge Soviet energy supplies is needed. If past experiences are any indication, nothing will be done until a crisis has been reached, and in this case it will unfortunately then be too late. The situation with regard to energy resources was analyzed in considerable detail by the Truman Commission in 1952. This commission also made a series of recommendations to the federal government as to how to avoid disaster. Unfortunately, the report of the findings has essentially been ignored by subsequent administrations of the federal government.

During the next few decades, it will be interesting to observe how and when the American people and their elected leaders come to the realization that they have some rather serious problems. These are problems that have been discussed in the past but about which very little has been done, largely because most people are more concerned about the present than the future. How these problems are solved, if they are, will also be interesting to observe. One conclusion is certain. We have at most three or four more decades in which we can live in the sort of ignorant bliss we have enjoyed for the past quarter of a century.●

BALANCE(S) OF POWER BOOK III B(i) NATO NORTHERN FLANK

HON. JOHN B. BRECKINRIDGE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, although the confrontation of opposing forces in the center sector of NATO and the Warsaw Pact poses the most apparent threat to peace in Western Europe, we must be aware also that military activities in the areas known as the flanks of NATO may be regional developments with the potential to do equal damage to the military balance in Europe.

Today's selection, "The Nordic Balance," examines the awesome Soviet presence on the Northern flank, and particularly the buildup of Soviet bases in its Kola Peninsula region. The author, Col. Arthur F. Dewey, suggests that "there are indeed limits to tampering with the Nordic Balance, beyond which the U.S.S.R. ventures only at the risk of upsetting the wider international balance of power," concluding that those risks must now appear worth taking to the Soviets. Accordingly, this analysis demands our attention.

This writing first appeared in Strategic Review, Fall 1976. The first part of Col. Dewey's article follows:

THE NORDIC BALANCE

(By Col. Arthur E. Dewey, USA)

IN BRIEF

Perhaps least noticed in the recent development of Soviet naval power is the region which contains most of that power—the Northern Cap and the Baltic Sea. The Murmansk area contains the world's largest naval and submarine base and one of the world's mightiest concentrations of military power. This area supports more ships than are supported by all ports of the United States combined. The most important consequence of this military build-up is the perception it fosters that Norway has now fallen behind the legitimate defense lines of the Soviet Union. A second development suggests the opposite hypothesis: that new technology of the weapon systems based on the Kola Peninsula now frees the Soviet Navy from its vulnerable egress gauntlets and thus sharply reduces the strategic importance of Norway. These seemingly contradictory hypotheses converge in the conclusion that the concept of Norwegian neutrality, soundly discredited in World War II, may again become a thinkable proposition. The heart of the problem we are now witnessing with respect to the Nordic Balance is the asymmetrical application of the rules of balance by the USSR and NATO. Although the military part of NATO has voiced a realistic appreciation of the situation for some time, the shifting of the Nordic Balance is basically a political issue and needs to be assessed in NATO's political circles. An initiail step would appear to be an appraisal by the United States national security apparatus of the northern flank in its entirety. Hopefully, from such an appraisal would come a commitment from the United States to consult with its NATO partners and seek a set of guidelines designed to restore and regulate the balance in the North and to communicate those guidelines to the USSR and the Warsaw Pact. Progress must also be made in the crucial area of bilateral U.S.-Norwegian issues before one can hope for any broader adjusting mechanisms of the Nordic Balance to have a lasting effect.

The most insistent and pervasive voices in Western strategic circles today carry the message that the impulses, and the capabilities, of Soviet expansionism are rapidly coming to alignment. The growth of the Soviet Navy has been fundamental to the capability side of this equation. This growth has been rapid; the kinds of equipment and doctrine developed have been carefully structured to support an expansionist global strategy; and the locations for this formidable build-up of power have been calculated to minimize the handicaps of geography for the Soviet Union, while exploiting the geopolitical vulnerabilities of her adversaries.

Western strategists have singled out for special attention the increased Soviet naval presence in the Mediterranean—its impact on the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's southern flank, and on war and peace in the Middle East; they have watched the gradual build-up of Soviet presence and littoral anchorages in the Indian Ocean region; and in the post-Vietnam era, they are watching. In particular, Soviet challenges to U.S. naval presence in the Pacific. Perhaps least noticed in the recent developments of Soviet naval power is the region which contains most of that power. Well over one-half of the USSR's newly developed naval capability is tucked away in one of the "safest" and least worried about corners of the earth—the Northern Cap and the Baltic Sea. Most of this sea power in the north, contained in the Northern Fleet, is positioned in one of the world's remotest and most inhospitable spots—the largely icebound Kola Peninsula.

It is the intent of this article to explore the Soviet Union's reasons for stationing so much of its military strength in that place, and to examine the potential influence of this strength in the so-called "Nordic Balance" (particularly with respect to Norway because of the special location of this NATO member) and on the general security posture of NATO.

To be sure, alert observers in U.S./NATO military circles, and especially Norwegian strategic thinkers, have in the past called attention to this problem and what it may mean for the Nordic countries and for the West. It seems important to highlight the situation at this time for two principal reasons. First, although the large build-up of naval power opposite NATO's northern flank has been a reality for nearly five years, the politico-military impact of the situation has developed so glacially that one could say that only within the last year has it been possible to shift from speculation over its meaning to identification of specific trends. Secondly, where trends adverse to Western security interests are identified, there may still be time to reverse, or attempt to reverse, some of them.

THE OVERALL BUILD-UP PATTERN

Several points, or segments, stand out on the long curve, which stretches from root impulses of the Soviets to project influence beyond their homeland to the achievement of a capability to do so, which we are watching today. Frustration and stagnation of the Cold War seem to have dramatized the Soviet Union's requirement to leap out of its shell of encirclement and rectify the military imbalance which so clearly constrained its ability to influence events far from its shores. A key point on this curve is certainly the humiliation the Soviet Union suffered as a result of the October 1962 Cuban missile crisis. The extent to which this event translated into subsequent Kremlin decisions is alluded to in the remarks of a senior Soviet diplomat to John J. McCloy as the confrontation was drawing to a close. He said, "This will never happen to us again."

Efforts to insure it would not happen again brought about a complex orchestration of military programs, not least of which was the program to redress the strategic nuclear imbalance which figured prominently in the Cuban missile confrontation. In addition, the imbalance in general purpose air and sea forces, strategically deployable, was a sobering lesson for the Soviets. The case is convincing that Cuba was the proximate cause for a rethinking of the role of military force in support of foreign policy objectives. The Soviet Navy, especially in its widening pattern of maneuvers and deployments, became the most visible instrument in undertaking an enlarged political/diplomatic function on the part of general purpose forces.

In addition to signaling a change in naval employment doctrine, the post-1962 actions of Kremlin policy-makers also represented a ratification of the design of Navy Commander-in-Chief Sergei Gorshkov. This design, parts of which trace their beginning to Admiral Gorshkov's appointment as Navy Chief in 1955, called for: global naval intelligence gathering (largely through fishing trawlers); construction of what was to become the world's largest submarine fleet; arrangements for the global infrastructure of facilities, or access to facilities needed by a great naval power; development of sea control capability, utilizing attack submarines, but especially missile-firing surface ships; and ability to project power ashore with helicopter carriers and eventually aircraft carriers.

In a Navy Day speech in July 1966, Admiral Gorshkov was able to declare: "An end has been put to the complete domination of the seas by the imperial powers." In another Navy Day speech four years later, when the major portion of the build-up had been completed, Gorshkov stated: "Soviet navy ships are constantly on the ocean, including the stamping ground of the NATO strike fleets." In a public statement in September 1970 he said: "In the past our ships and naval units have operated principally near our coasts. Now we intend to prepare for broad offensive operations against the sea and group troops of the imperialists in any part of the world's oceans and adjacent territory."

Much of the military force confronting the "NATO strike fleets" is contained in the largest of the Soviet Union's four fleets, the Northern Fleet with its headquarters at Murmansk and operational elements based nearby along the relatively short, ice-free portion of the Kola Peninsula shoreline. This complex has made the Murmansk area the world's largest naval and submarine base, and one of the world's mightiest concentrations of military power. This area supports more ships than are supported by all ports of the United States combined. Here are based approximately 500 surface vessels, including 60 major combatants. The Northern Fleet commands a total of 175 submarines, including 80 with nuclear power. Most significantly, nearly 70 per cent of the Soviet top priority naval capability—the ballistic missile submarine—is based in the Murmansk vicinity.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE SOVIET BUILD-UP

A rigorous assessment of what this relatively recent development means for Norway, for NATO, and for United States-Soviet relations is already overdue. The situation takes on an acute importance when one considers its impact on the very cornerstone of security relationships among the Nordic states, and between these states and the Soviet Union—the so-called Nordic Balance. This balance began to take shape as early as the entry of Denmark and Norway into NATO in 1949. Mindful that geography had made their territories an inescapable part of the strategic calculus of the Soviet Union, entry into a rival military alliance was softened by Danish and Norwegian unilateral renunciation of NATO bases on their soil in peacetime. Shortly thereafter, this was followed by a ban on the peacetime shortage of nuclear weapons. Concomitant with the formulation of this position, known as the "base and ban" policy, was the undertaking in the Norwegian Parliament (Storting to compensate for these restrictions on the deployments of allied forces with a corresponding increase in Norwegian conventional strength).

Self-restraint and deterrence, then, became the principal components of the Nordic Balance. Self-restraint has acted, not only to assure the Soviets that their defense sensitivities are taken fully into account in this part of the world: it also reassures the Nordic neutrals—Sweden and Finland—who are well aware of the strategic value of their northern regions to the Soviets should the USSR perceive threats or provocations by, or on behalf of, the other Nordic NATO members. Deterrence, on the other hand, involves first the Norwegian forces deployed in the north, and Norway's perceived will to resist from the outset any Soviet moves against her territory. But to be effective, deterrence depends upon Norway's link with the other forces of NATO, and the clear understanding that these forces will also be employed to resist violations of Norwegian sovereignty.

In theory, these stabilizing mechanisms of self-restraint and deterrence are designed to cope with attempts to alter the security equilibrium. That is, if weight is added on the Soviet side, the balance can be restored by adding more Norwegian forces, or by removing the "base and ban" restriction on other NATO forces. In practice, however, such compensating moves do not appear to be available. To begin with, the force increase envisaged to offset the "base and ban" concession has yet to materialize in Norway. In the fifteen years since the Storting unanimously recognized the need for the offset, there has been no serious attempt to bring it about. Yet the assurance, or self-restraint, stabilizer, which included not only "base and ban," but also bars to allied maneuvers in Finmark (that part of Norway contiguous to the USSR) and allied air or naval activity east of 24° east longitude, appears to be locked in concrete. Both within Norway, and by the USSR, self-restraint as defined by these restrictions is viewed, not as part of an adjusting mechanism, but as a sacrosanct tenet or Norwegian foreign and domestic policy. For example, the Soviet side of the scales can be weighted at will with almost no likelihood of counterweights being added by the countries on the other side in the region (and conversely, Norwegian attempts to strengthen its forces can be challenged by the USSR through invocation of its meaning of the "balance"). So one needs to view the Nordic Balance, not in terms of its potential as a stabilizer for the region, but in terms of the dangers it holds, as currently practiced, for institutionalizing disequilibrium.

Given these characteristics of the Balance, the massive weight represented by the Kola Peninsula build-up has ominous implications, both for Western security and for Norwegian freedom of action. One of the first spokesmen to describe the seriousness of this new situation in the North was the Norwegian Minister of Defense speaking to the Storting in November 1970: "One of the most powerful groups of bases in the world has now been built up close to Norway's borders with Russia . . . the large scale exercise Sever in July 1968 and Okean in April 1970 proved that the Soviets are capable of undertaking amphibious operations at great distances from their base, and that an exercise pattern has now been created which, in future, would make it possible for an amphibious force to set out from the Baltic and Kola Peninsula without this necessarily having to be noted as unusual."

Later, Norwegian Prime Minister Trygve Bratteli stated in a July 1971 interview with United Press International: "The Soviet Union has carried out a colossal military build-up on the northern flank of NATO where her military forces are greater than ever before, with the possible exception of the Second World War . . . the fact that such great military strength is deployed so near to our country underlines the seriousness of the international strategic situation."

The Defense Minister's characterization of the Kola Peninsula augmentation is noteworthy in the context of Norway's consistent policy of self-restraint in the face of security moves by its giant Soviet neighbor. The strength of Mr. Bratteli's retort suggests that there are indeed limits to tampering with the Nordic Balance, beyond which the USSR ventures only at the risk of upsetting the wider international balance of power. In the calculus which led to their approaching, and even exceeding, these bounds, Kremlin strategists must have taken into account the geographical and political aspects of the Nordic environment, along with the superpower relationship, and concluded that the risks were indeed, worth taking.

From the geographical standpoint, Moscow's military planners surely recognized that they were positioning the preponderance of their naval power in one of the world's most inhospitable environments. For example, while the Gulf Stream maintains a year-round channel of open water to Murmansk, just east of that city, winter ice shuts off all but a small portion of the Peninsula's coastline to surface shipping for nearly six months of the year. This limitation alone compresses the bulk of the Kola naval complex into the short coastal band between what was formerly Finland's Petsamo Peninsula (now Soviet Pechenga, following annexation after World War II) and the ice line east of Murmansk. Even more vulnerable than the crowded location of the Peninsula bases, however, is the channelization of the fleet when it leaves its bases for the open sea. Egress to attack areas and firing positions leads through three formidable choke points. The first is encountered almost immediately on leaving the concentrated base areas—the gateway guarded by Norway's North Cape on the south and Spitsbergen Island on the north. Through this gap, the ice in winter may force surface shipping into an even narrower channel closer to Norway's northern coast. The second and third gateways also anchor on NATO territory, i.e., Greenland-Jan Maven Island-Lofoten Island, and Greenland-Iceland-United Kingdom. These choke points not only define the Soviet egress gates; they also represent NATO's logical defense and surveillance lines against its principal undersea and surface attack threats.

WHY HAS THE USSR DONE IT?

Why then would the USSR install such a crucial strategic asset on a largely icebound peninsula, contiguous to a NATO member, and at the end of sea lanes choked by NATO territory?

Accepting the fact that the Kola basing meets the distance requirements to the Fleet's prime target areas, perhaps the simplest answer is that this location is better than any of the others. Look at the home ports of the other three fleets—the Baltic, the Black Sea and the Pacific—together with the gauntlets each must run in reaching its operational areas. The Baltic Fleet, based in the Leningrad area, offers perhaps the best comparison since it, too, is positioned opposite NATO's northern flank. Its exit through the Kattegat, Skagerrak, and Oresund is clearly more restrictive than that faced by the Northern Fleet. Similarly constrictive gateways guard the Black Sea Fleet at the Bosporus and the Dardanelles, and the Pacific Fleet at the Sova, Tsugaru, and Tsushima Straits.

Beyond the risk of geography, there were the risks of politics. There was, indeed, the Western interpretation of Nordic Balance to consider—an arrangement in which the Nordics themselves and indirectly, the U.S. superpower had a considerable stake. What then could have led political analysts in Moscow to conclude that a large-scale, potentially provocative build-up, which the Kola challenge to NATO's north flank clearly represented, rested within tolerable limits?

Several factors suggest reasons for the USSR acting as it did. With respect to the risk of pressing NATO too hard in the North, the psychology of the region has been conditioned to just the opposite concern, i.e., provoking the USSR. It has also been recognized that NATO's preoccupation is with the central region of Europe. Henry Kissinger addressed this focus on the center, at the expense of the flanks, while he was still a Harvard professor in 1963—approximately two years before the Kola build-up began in earnest. He wrote in a foreword to a paper entitled, "Europe's Northern Cap and the Soviet Union": "Most of NATO thinking has concentrated on the contingency of a massive Soviet attack on the central front.

Very likely, this danger is less real than that of Soviet pressures in peripheral areas where Soviet power can be demonstrated at much smaller risk. The Northern Cap is remote geographically and psychologically from the overriding concerns of Atlantic strategy."

Another key political factor lessening the risks of a Soviet move opposite the northern flank is the relatively greater instability of the southern flank. When NATO had to divert its attention to the edges of the Alliance, it was, of course, to the southern edge that it looked—to Greece and Turkey, and to Portugal.

Perhaps equal in importance to the external political factors in NATO are the internal political trends in Norwary, and the effect of these trends on Norwegian reaction to external strategic changes. First of all, Norway's impressive record as a stalwart NATO partner suggests continuing resistance to outside pressure and influence. Norway became a charter member of the Alliance in 1949. Support since then, as measured in public opinion polls, has been consistently solid, ranging from a low of 56 per cent to a peak of 64 per cent. In a recent sounding, 60 per cent favored continuation of the NATO link, including a surprising 30 per cent of the normally anti-NATO far left political coalition.

Other indicators similarly point to the steadfastness of Norway's NATO commitment. Norwegian military expenditures per capita, for example, have remained consistently high among NATO members. Norway has also taken an aggressive lead in such Alliance modernization/standardization projects as the replacement of the F–104 fighter aircraft with F–16s.

This the record seems to argue against any near-term weakening of Norwegian resolve or change in defense policy. Other factors need to be looked at, however, in assessing such prospects over the longer term.●

THE TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO DEBATE, NO. 4 AND NO. 5

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues another exchange of "Dear Colleague" letters I have had with proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey.

In their fourth letter, the proponents of the embargo argue that in the last 4 years Turkey has failed to make a single substantive response to congressional concessions in lifting partially the embargo and allowing limited FMS transactions.

And in their fifth letter, it is argued that the Turkish arms vote will be used as a wedge in the administration's growing effort to exclude Congress from its rightful place in the foreign policy process.

In my reply, I point to the recent detailed and constructive Turkish proposals to which the Greeks have replied. The Turkish proposal and the Greek response give new hope that some progress can be achieved and that the suffering of the Cypriot people will be alleviated if the embargo is ended. It should be said that the vote on the Turkish arms embargo will not adversely affect congressional activism in foreign affairs which will continue, is necessary, and has, on many occasions, helped produce better policies that served the national interest.

The exchange of letters follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 1978.

THE EMBARGO AND TURKISH INTRANSIGENCE

DEAR COLLEAGUE: We will soon be called upon to vote again on the Turkish arms embargo. Because this issue first came before Congress nearly four years ago, many important details tend to be forgotten. In addition, many Members have joined the House since this issue was first considered in the wake of Turkey's August, 1974 invasion and occupation of forty percent of Cyprus.

The Administration suggests, in its effort to lift the embargo, that the failure to achieve a Cyprus settlement is due, not to continued Turkish intransigence, but to Congressional inflexibility. If Congress would only ease the pressure on Turkey, we are told, Turkey would respond by taking the substantive actions necessary to promote a Cyprus settlement.

The Administration's argument ignores the clear historical record.

Congress has taken action after action in the past four years to "ease the pressure on Turkey" in response to similar Administration pleas. Yet Turkey has failed to make a single substantive response to these Congressional concessions. It seems, in fact, that Congressional flexibility on this issue has merely encouraged further Turkish resistance.

We ask you to consider the following facts:

Congressional action—September 1974; Congress delays embargo two months as Kissinger's request to use his influence on Turkey.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—December 1974: Congress delays embargo two more months at Kissinger's request to use his influence on Turkey.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—October 1975; Congress relaxes embargo to allow: (a) $185 million in arms ordered before embargo to be released to Turkey; (b) unlimited commercial arms sales to Turkey; (c) future FMS sales to Turkey.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—1974–1976: Nine meetings with President Ford and/or Secretary Kissinger initiated by embargo supporters to show ways Congress would move immediately if Turkey indicated it wanted to solve Cyprus.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—April 1976: Congress authorized $125 million in FMS to Turkey for FY 1976.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—May 1976: Congress adds $125 million in FMS to Turkey for FY 1977.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—April 1977: Congress increases FMS to Turkey for FY 1978 to $175 million, a forty percent boost.

Turkish action: No response.

When the Administration claims that Congress is responsible for preventing progress on Cyprus, remember the past record of substantive actions taken by Congress.

When will Turkey act?

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 1978.

THE EMBARGO AND CONGRESS ROLE IN FOREIGN POLICY

DEAR COLLEAGUE: In our previous letters to you about the Turkish arms question, we have discussed a number of reasons why continued Congressional support for the embargo is necessary:

The embargo is required by law so long as the Turkish occupation of Cyprus, aided by American-supplied weapons, continues.

Effective use of the embargo represents the best chance of settling the Cyprus question and restoring full human rights to the more than 200,000 refugees now living there.

The embargo has never been given a chance to work, and a strong Congressional vote in favor of the embargo at this time would demonstrate conclusively the futility of further Turkish intransigence on Cyprus.

Lifting of the embargo would threaten grievous consequences to the southeastern flank of NATO.

Turkey has utterly failed to respond to previous Congressional concessions with respect to the embargo.

Each of these is, in our view, reason enough to vote for continuing the embargo—together, they make a case which simply cannot be ignored.

But events of recent weeks suggest still another reason to resist Administration pressure on this important issue: The Turkish arms vote will be used as a wedge in the Administration's growing effort to exclude Congress from its rightful place in the foreign policy process.

Certain high-ranking members of the Administration have made no secret of their distaste for a Congressional role in the conduct of American foreign policy. They see it as "interference"; they feel their "hands are tied".

We disagree. We feel that a strong and active Congressional role is required not only by our Constitution, but by the needs of the present day as well.

We reach this conclusion with the experience of recent years firmly in mind. Our long and tragic involvement in Vietnam was in large part a result of Congressional acquiescence in uncontrolled Presidential diplomacy.

And the retreat of the White House behind an ever-widening cloak of secrecy and claims of "national security"—again with Congressional acquiescence—made possible a Watergate, a long train of abuses in which the legitimate organs of government were subverted to serve wrongful ends.

Largely as a consequence of these two events, Congress has begun to reassert its proper role in the conduct of American foreign policy. Congress should resist any effort to neutralize this process.

We need not accuse the Carter Administration of bad intent to recognize that the members of the executive branch are not always correct in their assessments of our national interest.

We know that, even now, the White House is of several minds about how to deal with Congress on foreign policy questions. A decision by Congress to surrender to Administration pressure on the Turkish arms issue will be seen as an abdication of our newly-regained responsibilities, and will enable some members of the executive branch to continue to press their efforts to bypass Congress.

As a clear statement that Congress remains committed to an active but proper role in the foreign policy process, we urge you to reject the Administration's effort to remove the arms embargo against Turkey.

Sincerely,

Dante B. Fascell, John Brademas, Edward J. Derwinski, Charles Rose, Benjamin S. Rosenthal, Parren J. Mitchell, Norman Y. Mineta, James J. Blanchard, Mario Biaggi, Robert W. Edgar, Norman E. D'Amours, Paul E. Tsongas, Barbara A. Mikulski, George M. O'Brien, Wyche Fowler, Jr., Martin A. Russo, Donald M. Fraser, Benjamin A. Gilman, John L. Burton, James J. Florio, Charles B. Rangel.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: This letter is in response to the fourth and fifth letters sent to you by the proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey. Their fourth letter addresses the question of whether there has been no progress toward a Cyprus settlement because of Turkish intransigence or Congressional inflexibility and the fifth letter deals with the role of Congress in foreign policy and the implications of the Turkish vote on that role.

Arguments made by the proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey:

1. In the last four years. . . . Turkey has failed to make a single substantive response to. . . . Congressional concessions.

2. Congressional flexibility on this issue has merely encouraged further Turkish resistance.

3. The Turkish arms vote will be used as a wedge in the Administration's growing effort to exclude Congress from its rightful place in the foreign policy process.

Counter:

1. Turkey has recently made detailed, constructive proposals which give new hope for successful progress.

Secretary General Waldheim has termed recent Turkish proposals as "concrete and substantial". Among other things, the Turks have offered to:

Consider making substantial territorial readjustments in six, specific areas;

Permit up to 35,000 Greek Cypriot refugees to return to an initially UN-protected Varosha as soon as talks resume;

Carry out substantial further reductions in the number of Turkish troops on Cyprus beyond the more than 17,000 troops already withdrawn;

And reopen the International Airport at Nicosia under the United Nations auspices.

These proposals are not all that the Greek Cypriots want and deserve, but they reflect a clear improvement over other, previous Turkish offers and the Turks have said these proposals are initial positions and are negotiable.

It cannot be said, as the proponents of the embargo argue, that Turkey has failed to make a single substantive response in the last four years.

2. It is unreasonable to expect any proud nation to capitulate to U.S. pressure.

Turkey, a proud and firmly independent nation, rejects the idea of yielding to pressure. The Turks find the embargo a painful humiliation and it has stiffened their resistence to making substantial concessions. The embargo has led to anguish in Turkey over its treatment by the United States after what the Turks regard as thirty years of steadfast pro-West support. A successful negotiating environment will be almost impossible to arrange as long as the embargo is in effect.

3. Turkey should not be expected to respond to moves by the U.S. Congress with immediate moves on Cyprus.

The Cyprus conflict involves decades of inter-communal tensions and its resolution will require detailed and complicated negotiations. Turkish moves on the Cyprus issue will come in negotiations between the Greek and Turkish Cypriots, not directly and immediately because of legislation Congress may or may not take.

The Congressional legislative process cannot determine the moves, concessions and compromises—the substance—which may be part of a Cyprus settlement but Congressional action, in this case the embargo, can affect the timing and the environment in which negotiations may or may not take place. The embargo has had a negative impact on Cyprus negotiations and in creating an environment in which the parties will negotiate.

4. The vote on the Turkish arms embargo will not adversely affect Congressional activism in foreign affairs which will continue, is necessary and has, on many occasions, helped produce better policies that served the national interest.

Congressional activism, which is defensible, is not the issue in the vote. Congress, like all other foreign policy actors, however, should be accountable for its actions in the foreign policy arena. For whatever reasons, the embargo has not worked. For whatever reasons, the partial lifting of the embargo in October, 1975, did not lead to the Turkish responses many of us hoped for. Congress needs to act now to protect U.S. national interests.

As a result of this situation and the embargo, national interests of the United States throughout the Eastern Mediterranean are suffering and we are unable to help promote a Cyprus settlement. This is the present, unacceptable situation we must address, not the rights or wrongs of how we got here.

A new approach is the best hope for improving our relations with Turkey, Greece and Cyprus and creating an environment in which Cyprus peace talks can proceed. I hope you agree and will vote to lift the embargo.

Sincerely yours,

LEE H. HAMILTON.●

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS & AEROSPACE WORKERS ENDORSE H.R. 8729, AIRPORT AND AIRCRAFT NOISE REDUCTION ACT, AND URGE AFFIRMATIVE VOTE

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the million-plus membership of the International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers through their international president, William W. Winpisinger, have advised me of their strong support for H.R. 8729, the Airport and Aircraft Noise Reduction Act.

Although this is an environmental bill as Mr. Winpisinger points out, the IAM is quick to recognize that it also is a jobs bill and that it will play a vital role in maintaining our world leadership in respect to aerospace exports. As he further points out its represents a valuable opportunity for Congress to enact legislation that would help alleviate a wide range of problems that continue to plague our Nation's economic growth, stability, and social aspirations.

The following is what Mr. Winpisinger wrote me:

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS & AEROSPACE WORKERS,
Washington, D.C., July 28, 1978.

Subject: H.R. 8728, "The Airport and Aircraft Noise Reduction Act."

Hon. GLENN M. ANDERSON,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: On behalf of more than 1,000,000 members of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, I wish to express our endorsement and support for H.R. 8729. We firmly believe it represents a valuable opportunity for Congress to enact legislation that would help alleviate a wide range of problems that continue to plague our nation's economic growth, stability, and social aspirations.

First of all, passage of this bill would help rejuvenate our faltering airframe and aircraft engine industrial output which needs to be bolstered if we are to maintain our world leadership in respect to aerospace exports. This would be a positive step to significantly improve our balance of foreign trade.

Secondly, the environmental problems that have accompanied the introduction of jet aircraft to most communities would be substantially reduced, if not eliminated. However, in order to comply with prescribed federal noise standards, the airline industry, which is the keystone of intercity travel, must have a sound financial formula which ensures a positive, but not punitive, equipment transition. The introduction of new technology aircraft and engines would not only result in noise abatement, but would also substantially decrease the use of fuel and other vital energy sources of paramount concern to our nation's future.

Airport operators and responsible local governments must have the incentive and availability of funding to solve their airport-community problems, and this bill offers that initiative.

Finally, and of major importance, this is a jobs creating and public works bill affecting every part of the country and the adoption of this legislation would translate into tens of thousands of badly needed new jobs at a time when our country is struggling to regain its economic vitality. I strongly urge your support and affirmative vote for the passage of HR 8729.

WILLIAM W. WINPISINGER,
International President.●

ONE LAST CHANCE TO SAVE OUR AMERICAN CANAL IN PANAMA

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, once upon a time the Emperor had no clothes, but no one realized this until the proverbial little Dutch boy told us so. It is in this spirit that I would like to address myself to the White House press corps, to the networks, to the editorialists, and to American citizens still sick over the giveaway to Torrijos. And I would like to remind all of us that we have not yet lost our American canal in Panama. I would also suggest to all of us who stand opposed to the Carter-Torrijos treaties not to remain undaunted, but to reject defeat.

The fact remains that there is still one more test the treaties must withstand. This test is in the form of the enabling legislation which this body, the House of Representatives, must pass for the Carter-Torrijos agreements to go into effect. Without passage of this legislation, there will be no more money provided to implement the treaties. With passage of this legislation, the treaties still cannot take effect until March 31 of 1979.

To date, only the Senate has spoken on the matter of the treaties, and it is with a muffled voice that they have done so. Every poll, every survey, and every knowledgable reading of the American people reveals the overwhelming rejection of this grand sellout. But while the upper legislative Chamber has so acted, it is still incumbent upon that legislative body which is closest to the American people to finally decide the outcome for all time. It is up to us, the Congress of the people, to finally render a verdict. The giveaway of the Panama Canal is not the first second-rate idea to eminate from the Carter administration, and God protect us, it will probably not be the last. Yet it lingers before us now, and I pray that enough of us have the energy and resolve to see it dissolve. I hope that all of my colleagues will accept this responsibility, and to recognize that the Panama Canal question is on the ballot. This November, in elections everywhere around our country, the Panama Canal question will be the implicit issue which will decide how many of us will or will not return to the Nation's Capital as representatives of the people.

Already, citizens' organizations and independent groups of Americans have begun to rally around this one last chance to save the canal. One group in particular has been in the vanguard of this struggle, the Council for Inter-American Security (CIS). It is young, it is privately backed, and it is independent of outside political influences. But through the CIS campaign, candidates for Congress are being forced to take a stand on the canal question. Just as the Texas Presidential primary in 1976 became a Panama Canal referendum for candidates Ford and Reagan, the November elections are beginning to turn into a similar form of popular referendum on the future of the canal.

CIS is one of the leading organizations orchestrating a newspaper advertising campaign to bring the message to all of the American people. I commend every responsible effort to focus public attention on what ought to be the decisive issue in the congressional elections to come. No effort should be spared to remind every American that they have the opportunity to vote on the Panama Canal question in November by supporting or rejecting those politicians, those running for Congress, who are empowered with writing the ending to this critical chapter of America's history.●

VIRGINIA B. PATTERSON: 50 YEARS OF NURSING

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to speak of a truly remarkable person. Miss Virginia B. Patterson, today, ends an illustrious and dedicated nursing career which has spanned a half a century. During these 50 years she has given comfort and aid to all who came to her. She has worked relentlessly to care for those who needed her help and for the institutions which provide the medical attention and special needs of their patients.

Miss Patterson's achievements range from being surgical supervisor at Freeman Hospital in Joplin, Mo., to working as school nurse at the Joplin public schools for 11 years, to being director of nursing services at Johnson County Memorial Hospital in Warrensburg. From February of 1975 until today she has worked as director of special services at Johnson County Memorial Hospital in Warrensburg.

For many years Miss Patterson almost singlehandedly was responsible for the entire day-to-day operation of the Johnson County Memorial Hospital, coordinating all the necessary functions of the hospital. Until 3 years ago, Miss Patterson oversaw all three shifts at the hospital, while simultaneously serving on several staff committees and committees within the 10th District Nursing Association.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of nurses. There are even some who have worked as many years as Miss Patterson has dedicated to the nursing profession. But I am confident there are singularly few who can claim to have helped so many people in so many ways as has Miss Patterson. In her 50 years in the medical profession, she has transcended the boundaries of competence and embodied the ideal of human caring. I join all who know Miss Patterson in saluting her and thanking her for making this a better world in which to live.●

DEPRESSION AND SUICIDE AMONG YOUNG CHILDREN

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, the Los Angeles Times recently published a study of severe depression and suicide among American children. Like the phenomenon of spousal violence, few doctors or researchers had believed that there was so severe an incidence of suicidal acts among young children until very recently. But the results of the studies referred to in the Times' account indicates a problem of serious magnitude, which, like spousal violence, extends to all social classes.

Five percent of all the troubled children studied at one facility were found to be "severely depressed and self-abusive, or suicidal," an incredible percentage considering the paucity of attention this matter has been given. If this percentage is translated to the national population, the implications are staggering.

I particularly want to draw attention to the correlation which is drawn between this depressing behavior in children, and the incidence of family violence. In one study, 11 of the 13 children studied and found to be severely depressed came from families in which fighting was common. Even if the child is not involved directly in the violence between his parents, the witnessing of such fighting has a depressing effect on the child.

To place this fact in its proper context, we should look back to the figures on domestic abuse which were presented to this House a few months ago, during the considering of my bill, H.R. 12299, the Domestic Violence Assistance Act. During the debate on that legislation, which did not pass, unfortunately, I noted that the incidence of violence within families is far more frequent than generally presumed. Some estimate that violence occurs within half of the Nation's families, and that in 10 percent of the cases there is severe injury committed. As we learned during the hearings on H.R. 12299, family violence tends to spread from spouses to children, and children who are abused or who witness abuse as children tend to abuse their spouses in adulthood.

This article tragically records that we need not wait until those children reach adulthood to see the results of their exposure to, or involvement in, family violence. I hope that my colleagues will read this article, and keep it fully in mind when we next consider legislation to help the victims of domestic abuse:

CHILD SUICIDES—THEY ARE SAD, YOUNG AND WANT TO DIE

(By Lois Timnick)

Now as I was young and easy under the apple boughs
About the lilting house and happy as the grass was green . . .
In the sun that is young once only,
Time let me play and be
Golden in the mercy of his means . . .
—Dylan Thomas, in "Fern Hill."

The 11-year-old had slashed his wrists.

"I want to go to heaven," he sobbed. "I can't stand these stomach aches and being unhappy . . . if I could only die . . . it's hard to live . . . living is horrible. I just want to die because nobody cares if I die, so I just want to die."

Childhood, we are told, is supposed to be a time of joy and carefree innocence, but for this boy and many others it is so sad and painful they want to die. The poet's halcyon days of youth—easy, happy, golden—somehow elude them, and they want out of life even before they are old enough to understand the permanence and irreversibility of death.

For years the experts questioned whether young children could really suffer severe depression and intentionally seek death. Now it seems clear that they do both, and that many "accidents"—like swallowing poison or darting into heavy traffic—are in fact conscious or unconscious suicide attempts.

Consider, for example, these attempted suicides:

A 12-year-old girl hanged her doll by its neck, drugged her little sister, cut both her legs with scissors, slashed her wrists, and overdosed on hypnotic drugs. "I would be better off dead," she explained. "Then no one will ever have to look at my ugly face again."

An 11-year-old boy tried to kill his dog, attempted to suffocate his baby brother with a pillow, and stabbed pins and needles into his stomach. Asked why, he answered: "because mother doesn't have any love in her for me."

An 11-year-old boy, preoccupied with death and the idea of rejoining his dead grandmother, threatened to throw himself in front of a car, beat and disfigured his face, and finally jumped out the window of a two-story building.

A 5-year-old girl, obssessed with knives, burned her 3-year-old sister and tried to choke her with a shoestring, threatened her mother with a knife and fled from the house into heavy traffic.

A 6-year-old boy who wanted to die "because nobody loves me," first cut himself with his father's razor and was later found hanging from a second-story window.

These youngsters were among 34 preteens labeled severely depressed and self-abusive or suicidal when seen at UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute (NPI) during a four-year period. They represent only about 5% of the troubled 12-and-under children seen there. But even that number is staggering considering that until recently both parents and professionals ignored the possibility that young children could feel so much pain.

The wish to die can be based on misconception—as in the case of one youngster who thought that by killing himself he could rejoin a loved grandparent who had died and another who wanted to escape from home "to fly like Santa Claus." Of it can be a wanting to be dead just for the moment, since most children don't comprehend the finality of death before about the age of 8.

But the UCLA medical psychologist who studied these suicidal children says his findings "demonstrate that preteen-age children CAN experience the pain of life to the point of wanting to die. Aloneness, fear of rejection and threats of violence are as meaningful to a 4-year-old as to an adult," Morris J. Paulson said. "And health providers and caregivers must realize that (some) young children are 'at risk' for suicide."

Paulson was one of three national experts on childhood suicide and depression who spoke at a recent weekend conference at Lake Arrowhead sponsored by the Southern California Society for Child Psychiatry.

Of the nearly 2,000 children and teenagers in the United States who killed themselves in 1976 (the latest year for which figures are available), fewer than 200 were under 14 years old. But many suicides go unreported, and Paulson says so-called accidental injuries and poisonings in school-age children are often "purposeful, self-destructive acts."

For example, fully one-fourth of the admissions to the psychiatric unit at Children's Hospital of Los Angeles-Edgemont Hospital during its first year of operation have involved suicide attempts or a preoccupation with self-destruction, according to Dr. Howard Hansen, head of the division of psychiatry there and a participant in the conference.

The suicidal children at UCLA were mostly boys. Nearly half were failing in school despite normal IQs. Many had no friends. Some complained of physical ailments, while others turned their inner hate and anger onto others.

The economic level of the family—most were low-income WASPs, semiskilled and with high-school educations—did not seem to matter, since Paulson and his colleague Dorothy Stone found similarly suicidal children in an earlier study of more affluent families.

What did matter was the emotional poverty found in nearly all the families of suicidal children (some of whom had close relatives who had also attempted suicide); more than half the parents were separated or divorced; the remainder could hardly be said to be living in harmony.

As Paulson describes it: "For the younger age children, the most frequent immediate event leading to referral (to the NPI clinic for treatment) was perceived or imagined abandonment by a parent figure. For some families, divorce was the ultimate separation of a hostile, feuding, pathological relationship of violence between husband and wife."

In other families, Paulson said, the birth of a new brother or sister—a rival for the parents' love—and the mother's decision to go back to work were interpreted by the child as rejection.

Said one such 6-year-old, feeling emotionally rejected by his mother: "I want to die because nobody loves me."

"For many older children," Paulson continued, "the witnessing of family violence both verbal and physical, precipitated acute panic, fear and concern that they also may be the next victim of violent assault."

Said an 8-year-old girl: "They don't like me, I wish I was dead."

And another: "I would rather die than be spanked. They want me dead."

A battered 10-year-old whose 13-year-old brother had committed suicide earlier was philosophical: "Everyone kills and everyone dies . . . there is no escape."

(These children and their parents were treated with a variety of therapies: behavior modification training, individual or family psychotherapy, hospitalization, and foster home or institutional placement or adoption were sometimes necessary. Only 13 of those 34 treated could be traced three years later, but of those, none had committed suicide.)

Although depression is the leading cause of suicide, there are many more depressed children than completed suicides.

The psychiatrist who heads the only hospital ward in the United States devoted to studying childhood depression, Dr. Joaquim Puig-Antich of Columbia University and the New York State Psychiatric Institute, estimates that at least 1 percent of all children are depressed. This is based, in turn, on estimates that 10 to 15 percent of children in urban areas have some psychiatric disorder and that that disorder is depression between 5 and 10 percent of those cases.

When psychiatrists talk about Depression with a big D, however, they are talking about much more than just feeling blue. And sometime much less than wanting to die.

No one denies that children feel sad or discouraged at times, says UCLA psychiatrist Dr. Gabrielle Carlson. Or that they may feel depressed at being separated from a loved one or at being trapped in a miserable environment. The controversy among professionals has centered on whether children can suffer adult-like depression: an illness with definite signs and symptoms, a family history of related disorders, certain biochemical levels in the body and a predictable response to antidepressant drugs.

Studies by Carlson, Puig-Antich and others show that they do; whether they will outgrow it or become depressed adults, however, is another—and still unanswered—question that will require long-term follow-up studies, since depression most often first shows up when a person is in his 30s.

Carlson says the only two follow-up studies done so far have reached opposite conclusions.

She herself looked back for early signs of depression or other psychiatric illness in the childhoods of 50 manic-depressive patients at the National Institute of Mental Health; few were found. That type of depression—which has high and low mood swings—doesn't seem to start until adolescence, although Columbia's Puig-Antich believes some depressed children may simply start with the lows and not experience the first high (the manic phase of the illness) until the teens.

What, then, does a depressed child look like? Carlson says, for starters, that most readily admit that they feel sad or "down" if anyone bothers to ask. They may, however, also have a behavior disorder like hyperactivity that draws more attention: "When a kid comes in who's been burning down the house, you don't stop to do a depression inventory," Carlson notes.

Besides an unhappy mood, the depressed child may be irritable and weepy. Other symptoms include: thoughts of death or suicide, tiredness, withdrawal from other people or aggressiveness and getting into fights, loss of interest in things that used to be fun, guilt feelings, poor concentration (and consequently, poor performance in school), insomnia or a lot, and, sometimes, changes in appetite and weight. If a child appears sad and has as many as five of these symptoms for more than a couple of weeks, chances are he is depressed.

The current view of how depression develops in children goes like this: depression runs in families. But children born with a susceptibility to the disorder—a "high genetic load" in scientific parlance—may not become depressed until later in life, if ever—unless they are also subjected to traumatic events—separations, divorces, cruelty, neglect, the death of someone close—during their first five years

"The child has to be hit both ways," Puig-Antich explained.

Swedish researchers have shown that poor early home environment can lower the age of depression's onset from the 30s and 40s to the teens and 20s; Puig-Antich's studies suggest that, given a high enough genetice vulnerability, it can be pushed even lower. He sees childhood depression as the same illness suffered by adults but simply occurring at a different point in development.

In a pilot study of 13 depressed children between 6 and 12 years old (at the Bronx Municipal Hospital Center and the Sound View-Throggs Neck Community Mental Health Center in New York), Puig-Antich and other researchers at Albert Einstein College of Medicine found 11 had suffered major losses or long separations from parents or other important figures.

Eleven came from families where fighting was a way of life.

And information gathered on 83 of these children's relatives turned up severe depression or alcoholism in 51. Similarly, Carlson's study at UCLA of 28 depressed youngsters between 7 and 17 found that one-third of them had close relatives who were alcoholics, half had depressive or manic-depressive relatives, a fifth had sociopaths.

Blood samples from severely depressed children also showed an excessive amount of cortisol, an essential hormone secreted by the adrenal gland whenever the pituitary gland releases a certain hormone. Depression appears to be the only disease in which the cortisol "faucet" fails to shut off in the evening as it does in normal people. As the depression gets better, however, the cortisol level drops.

Measuring such hormone levels gives researchers a sort of window on the brain: the brain chemicals that have been implicated in adult depression—sertonin, norepinephrine, and dopamine—and which are the targets of the antidepressaant drugs, regulate the limbic system, thought to be the seat of the emotions. The limbic system, in turn, regulates the pituitary. So the amounts of hormones in the blood and breakdown products of these brain chemicals in the urine provides clues as to what's going on up in the brain.

The drug that seems to wipe out depression in these children is imipramine (Tofranil). Puig-Antich's pilot study showed that 7 out of 8 children responded to it, and now he has embarked on a $500,000, 3-year study that will, among other things, evaluate its effectiveness.

Imipramine is not used longer than 3 or 4 months, he said, and only to alleviate the depression so that other therapy can be started: "It's a losing ballgame to try to treat with psychotherapy while they are still depressed," he explained.

The study, which began three months ago, should provide many of the answers needed to help unhappy children before they reach the point of wanting to die.●

ARMS EMBARGO SHOULD BE MAINTAINED!

---

HON. WYCHE FOWLER, JR.

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House International Relations Committee, I have had the privilege to participate in formulating H.R. 12514, the International Security Assistance Act of 1978. Curiously, the finished product, which the House is debating on the floor today, differs significantly in one crucial area from what the majority of the committee members actually support; namely, the issue of lifting the Turkish arms embargo.

Debate over lifting the embargo had centered around two issues: A just solution to the Cyprus question and the need to maintain a strong southeastern flank of NATO. The question we must, therefore, ask is, will lifting the embargo resolve these issues? I believe it will not.

A just solution to the Cyprus question is already in existence. It can be found in United Nations General Assembly Resolution No. 3212 of November 5, 1974, which calls for the political independence and territorial integrity of Cyprus and a government which will provide autonomy for both Greek and Turkish Cypriots to enable them to pursue their own interests without compromising their rights. This kind of settlement could lead to the restoration of peaceful relations between Greece and Turkey. Furthermore, by improving relations between Turkey and Greece, this settlement would enhance their ability to defend the southeastern flank of NATO jointly.

By taking steps to repeal the embargo, Congress is putting itself in the position of undermining the laws which it has passed over the years. The embargo was a response to a clear violation of American laws and bilateral agreements already in effect. Under provisions of both the Foreign Assistance Act and the Foreign Military Sales Act the only response to the Turkish invasion of Cyprus in August of 1974 and the subsequent occupation of Cyprus was to institute an embargo as provided for under the law.

Despite the embargo Congress did make concessions to Turkey. The $185 million in weapons ordered prior to the embargo were delivered while the embargo was in place. In addition, more than $800 million in American arms were provided to Turkey through foreign military sales credits and commercial arms sales during the embargo. However, the Turkish Government has not responded by negotiating in good faith for a just solution to the Cyprus problem.

In light of these concessions and the lack of positive action by the Turkish Government, it is not logical to assume that lifting the embargo will spur the Ankara Government to negotiate in a more open and constructive manner. I hope that you will join me and a majority of the House International Relations Committee in defeating this premature effort to lift the Turkish arms embargo.

At this time I insert the separate views of the majority of the International Relations Committee at this point in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPARATE VIEWS OF REPRESENTATIVES DANTE B. FASCELL, CHARLES C. DIGGS, JR., ROBERT N. C. NIX, DONALD M. FRASER, BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL, LESTER L. WOLFF, GUS YATRON, MICHAEL HARRINGTON, CARDISS COLLINS, HELEN S. MEYNER, GERRY E. STUDDS, ANDY IRELAND, ANTHONY C. BEILENSON, WYCHE FOWLER, JR., JOHN J. CAVANAUGH, EDWARD J. DERWINSKI, J. HERBERT BURKE, BENJAMIN GILMAN, AND TENNYSON GUYER

A majority of the members of this committee oppose the administration's efforts to repeal section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act, which now provides for a limited arms embargo against Turkey.

We have reached this position for a variety of reasons, among which are the following:

As supporters of the rule of law in the conduct of American foreign policy, we recognize that Turkey's second invasion of Cyprus in August 1974, was a clear violation of the Foreign Assistance Act, the Foreign Military Sales Act, and our bilateral agreements with Turkey respecting the proper use of American-supplied weapons. The continuing occupation by Turkey of 40 percent of Cyprus constitutes a continuing violation of those laws and agreements.

As supporters of NATO, we recognize the great importance of our southeastern European defense flank, and we hesitate to take any action which might threaten the full participation of both Turkey and Greece in that defense effort.

As supporters of human rights, we are not convinced that lifting the embargo constitutes a course likely to lead to a just settlement of the Cyprus tragedy and a resolution of the refugee problem.

As supporters of restraint in U.S. arms sales abroad, we feel that lifting the embargo before Turkey has taken the substantive actions necessary to a settlement on Cyprus would serve as a harmful precedent to future recipients of American weapons.

And, finally, as practical men and women, we recognize that the embargo is, even now, a limited one. Turkey has received $600 million in U.S. arms since the embargo was first imposed. Even if the administration's amendment is defeated, Turkey will still receive an additional $175 million in U.S. arms for fiscal year 1979. Moreover, the provisions of section 620(x) themselves permit President Carter to end the embargo in a moment, if he is willing to certify to the Congress that Turkey is in compliance with the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the Foreign Military Sales Act, and its bilateral agreements with the United States, and that substantial progress has been made toward an agreement regarding military forces on Cyprus. We believe that these provisions offer an appropriate means of dealing with the Turkish arms question.

For the foregoing reasons, we believe that the administration's effort to end the Turkish arms embargo at this time should be defeated.

FAITH BETRAYED

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, terrorism has no limits. This repugnant fact was brought to my attention by a recent article in the Los Angeles Times. It appears that well-intentioned Christian churches, who for years have supported democratic, freedom-preserving African movements, now find that, inadvertently, they are supporting revolutionary terrorism. And the targets of the murder, torture and rape are often members of their Christian faith, fellow servants of God.

The following article offers us this sad revelation:

[From the Los Angeles Times, July 7, 1978]

AFRICA MISSIONARIES CAN THANK CHURCHES FOR THEIR TROUBLES

(By Georgie Anne Geyer)

If I were one of the dozens of American or European missionaries martyred recently in Rhodesia, these days from heaven I would be saying an extra prayer. It would be for the sanity of many of my church's leaders.

For if we are to look at the heinous murders of missionaries and educators realistically, there is one thing stranger than the fact that the churches themselves bought many of the bullets—the fact that church leaders can't figure out why missionaries are being singled out.

"It is as if the devil has gotten hold of the country," the Catholic bishop of Bulawayo, Henry Karlan, remarked, shaking his head after the most recent massacre last week. He is wrong. The devil isn't half the story.

He has the churches with him.

I have before me a press release from the World Council of Churches from April 16, 1975, headed: "Special Fund Allocates $479,000 to Liberation/Support Groups."

The release reads, "More than one-half of this amount will go to liberation movements of Zimbabwe (Rhodesia), Namibia and South Africa working for black-majority rule." In addition, aid continued to Mozambique and Angola, two Marxist one-party dictatorships supporting the Rhodesian terrorists.

At the recent synod of the Anglican Church of Canada, its primate, the Most Rev. E. W. Scott, was reported in Vancouver as saying that the church must support African "liberation" movements. Asked whether he thought that the church should provide assistance to Christian-based liberation movements rather than to Marxist-based ones, he said that no one could make such a "distinction."

In 1972, the world council appealed to British churches for support of its "Fund to Combat Racism." The fund's director said that the setting up of the fund was a symbol to the oppressed of "the transfer of power from the powerful to the powerless." Approximately $10,000 was given by the council to ZAPU and ZANU, the two groups widely believed responsible for the recent murders.

Proofs of this strange dialectic of guilt, martyrdom and criminal naivete could be offered indefinitely. But perhaps it is better to ask "Why?" A church does not deliberately kill its own prophets—or does it?

When the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, began giving aid to the African "liberation" movements in the early '60s, there was a good reason for it—a reason of which I approved. It was to end colonialism.

But by now they should know better (perhaps I should say that they should know something!). After all, the Catholic Church in Mozambique strongly opposed Portuguese colonialism and supported Frelimo, the "liberation" movement there, only to have Frelimo totally outlaw religion once it came to power.

The money, of course, is also supposed to go only for "humanitarian" purposes, but no one seriously believes that any more.

So where are we today? In a horrendous situation in which Marxist guerrillas based in Zambia and Mozambique systematically wipe out missionaries and church educators (who have made black Rhodesia the most educated black population on the continent) to (1) destabilize and terrorize the country; (2) get rid of the only ideology that opposes them—Western democracy and Christianity, and (3) leave a void that only Marxism can fill.

To just touch on the mountain of evidence: In May, 1977, Free Methodist missionaries were told by a terrorist leader, "If the Jews had not killed Christ, I would have done it"; in April, 1974, Sister Vianny of the Avila mission was lectured by a terrorist about "the Catholic Church representing the evils of capitalism"; surviving missionaries say guerrillas trained in Cuba and East Germany were more brutal and anti-Christian than locally trained ones.

But perhaps a document published by Mozambique's Frelimo in late 1975 was most prophetic: "Progressively, we will replace the religious element by the Marxist element. We will thus transform the false conscience into true conscience, so that Catholics may eventually destroy their own movement . . ."

And what is the reaction of today's Rhodesian church superiors to the carnage of their brothers and sisters in Christ? Over and over these past weeks, they have asked in their traumatized innocence, "Why should they kill us when we have been for them?"

The situation is complex. Most members and many ministers and priests of the world council and the Catholic Church and others certainly do not want their money used to rape nuns before axing them to death. They do not have to. The cerebral, remote decisions are made far away, and seldom analyzed.

But what is unforgivable on the decision-making level is the intellectual and moral incoherence of people who cannot even distinguish between Christian and democratic revolution and Marxist totalitarianism. One could almost say that these church leaders have introduced a new term into the historic Christian vocabulary: auto-martyrdom. One could certainly say that, while they think that they are living their faith by their actions, in actuality they are only killing it.●

COUNTERSPIES

HON. ROBERT McCLORY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, recently, the Chicago Tribune ran an editorial commenting favorably on the proposed foreign intelligence electronic surveillance measure now pending before the House.

This measure, which was passed previously in the other body, has now raised serious questions among our Members and is being actively opposed by the Association of Retired Intelligence Officers and many other individuals who are knowledgeable in the area of foreign intelligence.

I am attaching to these remarks copies of two letters to the editor which that editorial evoked.

The letters follow:

COUNTERSPIES

WASHINGTON.—It was with interest that I read your June 26 lead editorial entitled "Restraining the counterspies."

Your reference to pending legislation to control foreign intelligence electronic surveillance relates to a subject pending before the House Judiciary Committee on which I serve as the ranking minority member, and which has already been considered by the House Intelligence Committee on which I also serve.

You indicate support for electronic surveillance legislation to be developed "in such a way as to interfere as little as possible with operations that are essential to the national security." I would question whether legislation should interfere in any respect whatever with operations which are essential to our national security. Certainly, the administration bill which would prevent any and all electronic surveillance unless first authorized by an order of a special court could completely frustrate electronic surveillance activities, notwithstanding the urgency or seriousness of the need for intelligence information which may be available only through such means.

While commenting unfavorably on the measure which I have presented to provide statutory direction for electronic surveillance activities by the executive branch of government, you justify the involvement of a special court in such operations by stating that "enough evidence of past abuse has come to light since Watergate to justify nudging the pendulum back toward the protection of individual privacy."

I should point out that there is no evidence which has been produced in the Senate or House Intelligence Committee hearings indicating any abuses "since Watergate." Indeed, the justification which Sen. Kennedy [D., Mass.] and the American Civil Liberties Union give for this legislation is that domestic wiretaps, wrongfully excused on the ground of national security, were carried out against Joseph Kraft, Martin Luther King Jr., and Morton Halperin, but these were at least four years ago, and there is no evidence that any abuses have occurred during recent years while Atty. Gen. Bell and former Atty. Gen. Levi have been operating under strict presidential guidelines.

You conclude your editorial by stating that in your opinion as well as the Justice Department's "the intelligence agencies should be able to live with" the legislation providing across-the-board warrants for all foreign intelligence electronic surveillance.

I should advise you that at least one of the intelligence agencies remonstrated by convincing the House Intelligence Committee that, indeed, it could not live with such restraints and "special court involvement." While the other intelligence agencies have failed to speak up in opposition to the Carter administration's plan, the private expressions which have come to me are almost entirely to the contrary.

In my opinion, to transfer authority and accountability for foreign intelligence electronic surveillance from the President and the executive branch to a special court is unthinkable and dangerous to our national security.

ROBERT MCCLORY.

HIGHLAND PARK.—Thanks for the June 26 editorial on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Bill now before the House Judiciary Committee.

Rep. Robert McClory [R., Lake Bluff] is correct in looking closely at the bill despite the Senate's 95 to 1 passage. This nearly unanimous Senate rubber stamp was less a measure of intelligence than naivete about counter-intelligence.

The U.S. intelligence community must keep 1,400 foreign adversary agents on station here and their U.S. contacts and subagents under surveillance. This enormous national security assignment is much more than protecting sensitive information—it includes surveillance of covert operations of neutralization, sabotage, and subversion; dissemination of false information; infiltration for the purpose of deep penetration into commerce, industry, and government for manipulation of domestic and foreign policy, and assassination and terrorism.

The good intentions of the bill to curtail surveillance of U.S. citizens need not extend equally to noncitizens and certainly not to individuals intent upon overthrowing the government.

The U.S. intelligence community can best counter the enemy within without this legislation which adds blinders and ear muffs to the cloak and dagger uniform.

Member of the Association of Former Intelligence Officers.●

MISGUIDED U.S. POLICY TOWARD AFRICA

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, from July 31 through August 2, 1978, the House of Representatives will debate and vote on the foreign assistance appropriation bill (H.R. 12931). During the course of this debate, I expect to hear rhetoric from my colleagues concerning U.S. aid which purportedly, supports so-called socialist and Marxist countries like Mozambique and Angola. I also expect Representative ROBIN BEARD to offer an amendment to prohibit indirect aid to Mozambique and Angola through U.S. contributions to international financial institutions and other international organizations.

Mr. Speaker, the Beard amendments and the rhetoric associated with this amendment represent ill-conceived U.S. policy toward Africa. To begin with, they make the serious mistake of politicizing economic and humanitarian assistance and more significantly they assume that so-called socialist and Marxist nations have embraced communism. It is in regards to this last matter that I have submitted an article by distinguished author and commentator Carl T. Rowan. This article, which appeared in the July 27, 1978, Plain Dealer sheds much needed light on an area of foreign policy, which I am sad to say, many of my colleagues have convoluted.

The article follows:

UNITED STATES STUPID IN AFRICA
(By Carl T. Rowan)

WASHINGTON.—Americans ought not underestimate the importance of Nigeria's warning to Russia and Cuba that they should not overstay their welcome in Africa.

It is of great importance that the most populous and powerful black nation in Africa should publicly tell the Soviets that Africa "is not about to throw off one colonial yoke for another." Those were the words of Lt. Gen. Olesegun Obasanjo, Nigeria's head of state, at a summit meeting of the Organization of African Unity, Khartoum, Sudan.

Americans—Congress particularly—are so hung up on words like "socialist" and "Marxist" that we adopt stupid policies inimical to our national interest regarding countries like Mozambique and Angola. A majority of Congress, and a lot of newspaper editors, get their minds thrown out of joint because African leaders do not embrace capitalism or governmental systems that match our two-party cultural indoctrination. So Americans conclude, irrationally, that these African countries have become the allies and pawns of Russia, Cuba, East Germany or the People's Republic of China.

Obasanjo pointed out that Egypt, Sudan and Somalia threw out the Russians rather than see the Soviets become imperial rulers.

I recently was in Mozambique, where President Samora Machel governs "along Marxist lines." What on earth does that mean? It means that his Front for the Liberation of Mozambique (FRELIMO) moved quickly to wipe out a situation where doctors served only whites and a few important Africans. The African masses got little or no health care. So FRELIMO nationalized medical care and abolished private practice. Some 90% of the Portuguese doctors fled, leaving fewer than 50 to serve 9 million people. Still, Mozambique's masses are now getting more and better medical care, more inoculations against infectious diseases, than in 400 years of Portuguese rule.

Does this, and other socialist innovations by Machel, put Mozambique in the pocket of the Kremlin? Far from it. I found Mozambicans already up to their throats in disenchantment with the Soviets. They talk privately about how, last year, they caught the Soviet airline, Aeroflot, engaging in flimflammery of ticket prices, costing economically pressed Mozambique at least $3 million in precious hard currency. (Mozambique forced Aeroflot to close its Maputo office.) They talk about how the Soviets are ripping off Mozambique in a fisheries agreement where the Russians take a catch of about 10,000 tons a year out of Mozambican waters and pay a ridiculously low compensation.

But Congress is so blinded by the word "Marxist" that it will not let the United States offer Mozambique an alternative to exploitation by the Soviets.

Since independence three years ago Mozambique has suffered devastating floods, a severe drought and hundreds of military attacks by Rhodesia. It is losing at least $150 million a year because of the Rhodesian war, and is trying to feed some 50,000 refugees who have fled Rhodesia. Yet Congress has forbidden aid to Mozambique, meaning that the United States cannot provide even food, drugs, clothing or agricultural assistance. This is political insanity.

The rhetoric of American know-nothings puts Mozambique in the same bag with Uganda, Chile and other countries of gross oppression and human rights violations. This is shamefully unfair to Mozambique.

Congress ought to take a better-informed look at Mozambique. It will discover that, like Nigeria's Obasanjo, Mozambicans do not want the yoke of the Soviet Union to replace that of the Portuguese. And we ought not deny Mozambique an alternative.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1978

● Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, this month marks the 20th observance of Captive Nations Week. This year, as in every year since 1958, we set aside a week during July—the month of our own national independence—to honor those who have struggled to obtain the freedom that Americans enjoy as a right.

This yearly observance reminds us that all people do not enjoy basic liberties and human rights—a grim message brought home to us recently, when the Soviet Union, in blatant and callous disregard for human rights, sentenced Anatoly Shchransky, Alexsandr Ginsburg, and Viktor Pektus to prison terms for their so-called "crimes" of speaking out against government wrongs and attempting to help others leave the Soviet Union.

Even without the reminder of the cruelty of the recent Soviet action, we must recognize the continuing Soviet oppression of the millions of struggling individuals in Eastern Europe. These brave individuals have maintained their courage and perseverance, in the face of continued occupation and control by the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, it is vital that we in the United States do not disappoint these brave individuals. It is incumbent upon us to continue to voice our outrage whenever and wherever human rights are violated.

Captive Nations Week must be more than just a once-a-year occasion for speeches and rhetoric. We must continually demonstrate to the Soviet Union that we will not be silent in the face of systematic violations of international agreements such as the Helsinki Final Act.

Mr. Speaker, I am a cosponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 177—A measure which calls for independence for Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia, three Eastern European countries now suffering from Soviet occupation.

I believe this measure is a step in the right direction for a Congress which wants to affirm its commitment to the objectives of freedom and human rights. Let us reaffirm the principles of Captive Nations Week and pledge to support this resolution and any others which will discourage Communist oppression and encourage freedom in all captive nations.

Mr. Speaker, WCAU–TV in Philadelphia recently editorialized on the occasion of Captive Nations Week. I offer for the RECORD the text of that editorial, because I feel it is an intelligent, thoughtful statement about the underlying issues of importance of Captive Nations Week.

The editorial follows:

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

President Carter has declared July 16 to 23 "Captive Nations Week."

The idea of paying attention to and paying honor to "Captive Peoples" came out of American reaction to Soviet expansion following World War II.

Soviet dictator Josef Stalin rushed his tanks and his troops across Eastern and Central Europe following the collapse of Nazi Germany. He filled a power vacuum. People who thirty years before had heard the gospel of "self-determination of peoples" found themselves swallowed by new conquerors. Marxist totalitarianism was enforced by Red Army soldiers. And most of Europe's Slavic peoples were walled up behind what Churchill named "The Iron Curtain."

America's response was to try to live with it—to strengthen our own defenses—and to hope for change. Some change has come.

The American and Soviet superpowers have remained at the stage of where talk has replaced troops, where negotiation has been preferred over nuclear war. And we say this is good.

But events of this past week—the news of the trials of Jewish dissidents inside Russia—remind us of the connection between the enslavement of the Slavs and the continuing imprisonment of the human conscience.

The concept behind Captive Nations Week must, we feel, be more than a ceremonial sop to American voters of Eastern-European origin. We must continue to speak out for the human conscience and human rights wherever they are imperiled: in Central Africa, in Chile, in Korea, or in Russian courtrooms.

(File tape Russian invasions of the Ukraine.)

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of the Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of all meetings when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in meetings as they occur.

As an interim procedure until the computerization of this information becomes operational the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committees scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, August 1, 1978, may be found in Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

MEETINGS SCHEDULED

AUGUST 3

9:00 a.m.
Energy and Natural Resources
To continue mark up of proposed legislation designating certain Alaska lands as national parkland.
3110 Dirksen Building

Judiciary
Constitution Subcommittee
To continue hearings on S.J. Res. 134, extending the deadline for ratifying the ERA.
